But not for Strauss' Till are such niceties and preciosities. Yet with him, too, Dr. Koussevitzky would be not merely painstaking but finicky and meticulous, and over-sentimental as well. From the performance yesterday there emerged not the super-rogue of German legend, but a spring-struck poet. Gone was much of the diablerie, the irony, the humor and the folksy quality that rightfully should distinguish this music, and a false emotionalism, a devitalizing refinement put in their place. But for these things the performance of the Symphony, like those of the Preludes of Wagner and Debussy, made ample amends, and the audience departed well content.

Music

Monday Symphony Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall came the sixth and final concert in the current series of Monday night performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor made an eleventh hour change in his program; thus it contained the Bach Suite for Orchestra No. 3 in D major, instead of the announced "Suite Borodin" by Tcherepnin—an arrangement philosophically accepted by the audience, despite the disappointment it felt. The remaining numbers included the promised repetition of Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (J. M. Sanromá) and the Brahms Symphony in C minor.

If in the minds of those who listened last night, there may have lurked a doubt concerning the complete enjoyment of the Bach suite that doubt must have been dispelled upon the conclusion of the famous Air, intensified by the perfect unison of the violin choir. Too seldom does the concert-goer find opportunity to hear many of these charming Bach arias in their original form and setting.

Mr. Lambert found himself in august company last night, and a on a very recent occasion, agai acquitted himself, through the me dium of orchestra and voices, with n little credit. The performance agai reached a remarkably high peak and occasioned prolonged applause for conductor, pianist, the Cecilia Society which sang, and the orchestra, which played with verve and enthusiasm.

The symphony had a superb presentation, albeit the baton seemed at moments a bit heavy. But there could be no mistaking the richness of the climax which brought to a close a program than which these Monday patrons have probably had no finer.

G. M. S.

Monitor Apr. 28

IENCE MONITOR,

Symphony in Last of Series

Omaha Apr. 28

By MOSES SMITH

The beginning of the end of the music season was the last of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting a band that has been surpassingly brilliant in these closing weeks, had arranged a program consisting of the Bach D major suite, Brahms' C minor Symphony and Constant Lambert's "Rio Grande."

Lambert's apotheosis of jazz, first played here last Friday, and which we were hearing for the third time in four days, wears well. The principle reason for its novelty sustains it on repeated hearing, namely the fact that a composer has at last appeared who not only has worth-while ideas to express in the language of jazz but who also thinks in this language, finds it, in fact, his inevitable means of expression for the particular piece in hand.

The sole piano passages, cadenza-like — brilliantly played by Jesus Maria Sanroma — the colorful yet essentially economized jazz orchestration, the forceful (though somewhat weaker) pages for chorus — all these things gave evidence of a sure mastery of craft. There are sentimental pages, too, as in the music for solo contralto, but even these weave a theatrical spell. The whole performance, under Dr. Koussevitzky's inspired leadership, was remarkably effective.

The virtuosity with which the other two pieces were played was at some sacrifice of musical finesse. The last movement of the symphony, especially, was a bit over-blown. The audience was very enthusiastic throughout the concert.

ld of Music

SOME interesting figures may be gleaned from M. A. De Wolfe Howe's revision of his history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra published in 1914, bringing the history up to the close of the fiftieth season, which ended last month. The longest consecutive term of service in the orchestra is that of C. Barth, 'cellist, who has been a member from 1894, a term of thirty-seven seasons, under Paur, Gericke, Much, Fiedler, Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky, the only conductors under whom he did not play being Henschel, 1881-84, and Nikisch, 1889-93.

In Georg Henschel's term as conductor, 1881 to 1884, there were seventy-two men in the orchestra. During the terms of Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, and Emil Paur, from 1884 to 1906, the size of the orchestra varied from eighty-one to eighty-four. Karl Much, 1906-1902, raised the number to ninety-six and Max Fiedler, 1908-1912, made the membership 100. Under Henry Rabaud, 1918-1919, it was 102, and Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924, made it ninety-nine. Serge Koussevitzky in 1924 made it 105, increasing the number to 113 for the jubilee year, just ended.

Beginning with Annie Louise Cary, contralto, at the opening concert in 1881, the list of soloists is long, much too long to print here, but in the first decade were such other notable singers as Henrietta Beebe, Anna Drasdil, Emma Eames, Emmy Fursch-Madi, Emma Juch, Lilli Lehman, and Lillian Norica, sopranos; Sofia Scalchi, Emily Winant, Zelie Trebelli, Agnes Huntington, Mary H. How and Mathilde Phillips, contraltos; Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Georg Henschel, baritone, and Emil Fischer, basso.

Pianists included Adele Aus der Ohe, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Teresa Carreno, Helen Hopekirk, B. J. Lang, Adele Margulies, Julia Rive-King, Carl Baerman, Henry H. ss, Rafael Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, Moritz Rosenthal. Violinists in- T. Adamowski, Henry Heindl, eisel, Charles Martin Loeffler, l and Camilla Urso. 'Cel- itz Giese and Wilhelm rs were E. M. Heindl, der Freygang, harp.

rs came the sopranos , Lillian Blauvelt, Emma Calve, Clementine De Vere, Geraldine Farrar, Olive Fremstadt, Johanna Gadski, Ethyl Hayden, Frieda Hempel, Georgine von Januschowsky, Nellie Melba, Alice Nielsen, Milka Ternina, Maggie Teyte, Jeannette Vreeland and Julie Wyman; the contraltos Merle Alcock, Sophie Braslau, Marguerite D'Alvarez, Jeanne Gerville-Reache, Louise Homer, Louise Kirby-Lunn, Margaret Matzenauer, Kathryn Meisle, Sigrid Onegin, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Nevada Van der Veer and Emily Winant.

Tenors have been Daniel Beddoe, Italo Campanini, Edmond Clement, Richard Crooks, Ben Davies, Tudor Davies, Andreas Dippel, Arthur Hackett, George Hamlin, Roland Hayes, Paul Kalisch, George Meader, Lambert Murphy, John McCormack and Ellison van Hoose. Baritones and bassos have been Pasquale Amato, David Bispham, O. C. Bushnell, Giuseppe Campanari (also 'cellist in the orchestra from 1885 to 1893), Frangcon Davies, Charles Gilibert, Max Heinrich, Arthur Middleton, Fred Patton, Francis Rogers, Joseph Standigl, John Charles Thomas, Reinald Werrenrath and Herbert Witherspoon.

Some of the pianists have been Martha Baird, Harold Bauer, Richard Burmeister, Ferruccio Busoni, Alfredo Casella, Alfred Cortot, Eugen d'Albert, Vladimir de Pachmann, Vincent d'Indy, Ernst von Dohnanyi, Carl Friedberg, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Rudolph Ganz, Heinrich Gebhard, Walter Gieseking, Leopold Godowski, Katharine Goodson, Mark Hambourg, Myra Hess, Josef Hofmann, Helen Hopekirk, Ernest Hutcheson, Josef Lhevinne, Maier and Pattison, Guiomar Novaes, Ignace Jan Paderewski, John Powell, George Proctor, Serge Prokofieff, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Franz Rummel, Camille Saint-Saens, Olga Samaroff, Harold Samuel, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Emil Sauer, Xavier Scharwenka, E. Robert Schmitz, Martinus Sieviking, Alexander Siloti, Sigismond Stojowski, Antoinette Szumowska, Alexander Tansman and Olga von Radicki.

Violinists have been E. Fernandez Arbos, Richard Burgin, Mischa Elman, Georges Enesco, Samuel Gardner, Cecilia Hansen, Jascha Heifetz, Willy Hess, Franz Kneisel, Fritz Kreisler, Sylvain Nowak, Emile Sauret, Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding, Albert Stoessel, Joseph Szigeti, Jacques Thibaud, Anton Witek and Efrem Zimbalist. 'Cellists have been Jean Bedetti, Jean Guardy, Fritz Giese, Rudolf Krasselt, Josef Malkin, Maurice Marechal, Felix Salmond, Alwin Schroeder and Heinrich Warnke.

Mozart leads the list of composers in the fifty years with forty-three compositions, "The Magic Flute" Overture having been played the greatest number of times, nineteen. Wagner is next with thirty-eight numbers, "Die Meistersinger" Prelude leading with thirty-nine performances, the greatest number of times for one piece. Beethoven is next with thirty-six performances, the Fifth Symphony having been played thirty-seven times. Saint-Saens and Bach follow with thirty-two each, Liszt being next with thirty.

Tchaikovsky is represented by twenty-five numbers and the "Pathetic" Symphony has been played fifteen times; Dvorak by twenty-four pieces, "From the New World" Symphony having been played thirteen times; Haydn by twenty-two pieces, Symphonies No. 2, 13 having been played eleven times each; Mendelssohn with twenty-one and the "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music played twenty-three times; Schumann with twenty and Symphonies No. 1, 4 played twenty-three times each. Other composers with number of pieces and most popular compositions are:

Richard Strauss, 19; "Death and the Transfiguration," 17; Brahms, 18; Symphony No. 2, 30; Chadwick, 18; "Melpomene," 6; Sibelius, 18; Symphony No. 1, 9; Handel, 17; Concerto Grosso in D minor, 7; Rimsky-Korsakoff, 17; "Scheherazade," 12; Debussy, 16; "Images," 13; Schubert, 15; "Unfinished Symphony," 30; Rubinstein, 15; Piano Concerto in D minor, 14; D'Indy, 15; Symphony in B flat, 7; Strube, 15; Fantastic Dance, 3; Glazounoff, 13; Symphonies No. 4 and 6, 3; Stravinsky, 12; "Firebird," 6; Berlioz, 12; "Roman Carnival," 21; Respighi, 12; "Fountains of Rome" and "Pines of Rome," 4 each; Weber, 11; "Euryanthe" Overture, 25; Ravel, 11; "LaValse," 10; Loeffler, 11; "Death of Tintagiles," 7.

Some of the other composers with number of pieces are: Franck, Hadley, Hill, Honegger, Prokofieff, 10; Bruch, Grief, Smetana, Spohr, 9; Cherubini, Massenet, Raff, Volkmann, 8; Auber, Lalo, Humperdinck, MacDowell, J. K. Paine, 7; Bruckner, D'Albert, Gluck, K. Goldmark, Gounod, Rachmaninoff, Reger, Roussel, Vivaldi, 6; Albeniz, Sinding, 5.

RADIO PROGRAMS PAGE 6

From Globe Studio of WEEI

2:20 A M—Looking over the morning Globe.
3:15 P M—News bulletins.
4:00 P M—News bulletins.
5:35 P M—News bulletins.
6:06 P M—News bulletins

JUDGE DISCHARGES QUINCY MAN WHO MADE BEER

QUINCY, May 1—Declaring there was nothing in the present statutes to prevent a man making beer for his own use, Judge Avery of the District Court today discharged Oscar Dupont of Winter st, Quincy Point, an a charge of keeping and exposing liquor for sale.

The officers found 120 bottles of beer in Dupont's cellar, they said. Dupont said he had made the beer for his own use, and Judge Avery told him he knew no law to prevent it.

TODAY'S GLOBE CONTENTS

Page 18
Household Department.
Dorothy Dix' letter box.
Page 19
Household Department.
Page 20
Comic Strips.
Page 21
Hub couple held as bogus bill passers at New Haven.
Death Notices.
Page 22
Queen and governess risk lives at bedside of little Crown Prince Michael, ill with diphtheria at Bucharest.
North End school children have May Day program on Common.
Mayor Curley sounds keynote of Child Health Day in radio address.
Dr. George H. Bigelow reads children's charter in Child Health Day address.

Continued on the Ninth Page

rivalry between Harvard and Princeton since the break following the 1926 football game. It will mark, also, the opening of the Harvard

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 1 1931

ELABORATE HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season. The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
MAY 1931

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its final week of the season at Symphony Hall in Boston this afternoon. Works by Beethoven, Wagner, Debussy and Richard Strauss will be played.

The New York Little Symphony, Hans Bruno Meyer conductor, will present a program of compositions by Gretry, Haydn, Elgar, Albeniz and the conductor himself at Roerich Hall tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 2 1931

ELABORATE HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season. The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR
MAY 3 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN JAZZ PIECE

Introduces Popular Music During Concert Season in Massachusetts

Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "pops" programs.

But in this golden jubilee year Koussevitzky has dared to bring [illegible] tin pan alley within the limits of a symphony program, and even the most conservative auditors surrendered to the foot-shuffling impulse.

The piece, a jazz composition for orchestra, chorus and solo piano, was "Rio Grande," composed by the brilliant young Englishman, Constant Lambert, to a ragged-lined poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.

The composer left no doubt as to the jazz classification, using two trumpets, two French horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, percussion with five players, three kittle drums, side drum, tenor drum, bass drum, cymbals, Turkish crash, tam-tam, tambourine, castanets, triangle, Chinese tom- tom, combells, Chinese block, xylophone, and jeu de timbres. There were a few strings.

The singing was by the staid cecilia society, broken to jazz rhythms by Arthur Fielder. Here's a sample of "Rio Grande":

"By...the Rio Grande
"They dance—no...Sara...Bande
"On level banks—like...lawns above—the...glassy lolling...tide.
"Nor sing they forlorn madrigals
"Whose sad note Sti—rs the sleep-I—ng gales,
"Till...they wake
"Among—the—trees
"And—shake...shake
"The boughs
"And fright
"The night-in-gales."

"Seldom in symphony hall," wrote Philip Hale of the Herald, dean of Boston's music critics, "has there been so instant, spontaneous, so prolonged, so tumultuous recognition of an unfamiliar composition signed with un unfamiliar name."

H. T. Parker, of the Transcript, spoke of "a beatified jabb of music, texture and imaginative suggestion."

Penfield Roberts, of the Globe, thought both verses and music were "rather tame and conventional."

Wrote Warren Storey Smith, of the Post, himself a composer: "Some of Mr. Lambert's jazz seems to American ears merely tawdry."

* * *

There have been several announcements since last October of plans to form new orchestras, although these have not, thus far, resulted in many concerts. The Civic Symphony of New York made a preliminary announcement last fall and a more definite one this spring, when Cesare Sodero was named as its conductor, although it has not yet embarked on actual concert-giving. The Co-operative Symphony Orchestra, organized with Mischa Guterson as conductor, with the object of aiding unemployed musicians, gave one concert on January 3, but has announced no further activities. Under Theophil Wendt, the New York City Symphony Orchestra made a promising debut on March 21, but also has announced no future plans. Another orchestral project, with Paul Eisler as conductor, was made known in January.

New orchestras, if of adequate artistic capabilities and on a sufficiently firm economic basis to weather their first season or two, are to be welcomed, although we are inclined to doubt the existence of a "music-hungry" public, at least a public that has merely to see the announcement of an orchestral concert by a new organization in order to attend it in large numbers. We are inclined to believe that, while our orchestral public will throng to hear performances under the direction of Messrs. Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky, they are likely to wait for a new organization to get a reputation before affording it consistently large patronage.

How much this may be due to a high and exacting standard and how much to the attraction of famous

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 3 - 1931

THE SYMPHONIC SEASON: A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WHEN the training orchestra of the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin's direction, played the last note of Ravel's "Bolero," it also closed New York's orchestral season of 1930-'31, as far as large orchestras are concerned, unless some as yet unscheduled concerts of this type should take place before the Philharmonic-Symphony's musicians reassemble early in July to open the annual symphonic season at the Lewisohn Stadium.

As before, the major part of the season's local orchestral activities was provided by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which gave 114 concerts in its various subscription series in New York and Brooklyn. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave ten concerts at Carnegie Hall and five in Brooklyn, the Philadelphia Orchestra again gave a series of ten concerts here, nine of a primarily orchestral type. The Manhattan Symphony again offered ten concerts, which makes the subscription total of concerts of a strictly orchestral character 148, as compared with 154 last season.

The Philharmonic-Symphony also gave its usual two concerts for the benefit of its pension fund, and its members also took part in the annual concert presenting the Schubert memorial's soloists. The Cleveland Orchestra gave its annual Carnegie Hall concert; two new organizations each offered a performance, while the Roxy Orchestra, enlarged to nearly 200 members for this series, gave fourteen Sunday morning concerts at the Roxy Theater for the benefit of unemployed musicians, offering programs mainly of standard orchestral works. A new Brooklyn orchestra, the Symphony Society of Brooklyn, gave two performances, increasing the total to 170 concerts, the same figure as last season's on a similar basis. Orchestral works were also played in certain concerts of the Society of the Friends of Music, but all its concerts this season belong to the choral rather than the orchestral class.

On a more inclusive basis, we can count in the two performances of Stravinsky and Prokofieff stage works given by the Philadelphia Orchestra with the League of Composers. Adding the twenty-four opera concerts at the Metropolitan, which included orchestral numbers, our total becomes 196 concerts by large professional orchestras for which tickets were sold. The corresponding total last season was 201; for 1928-'29, 168; for 1927-'28, 220.

The National Orchestral Association gave eight concerts for its subscribing members. Free concerts, including the eight given at the Metropolitan Art Museum under the direction of David Mannes, and the three given by the Manhattan Symphony in St. George's Church, concerts by two orchestras in the Borough of Queens and concerts in various parts of the city by amateur semi-professional, junior and student orchestras would also have to be enumerated to give a comprehensive statistical picture of the amount of public music making furnished during the season by orchestras numbering fifty or more players.

* * *

Works new to New York, not counting direct transcriptions, offered by the various orchestras during the last season in concerts for the paying public included the following:

Philharmonic-Symphony—Under Mr. Kleiber: Hindemith, Overture to "Neues vom Tage"; Krenek, Little Symphony; Lopatnikoff, Introduction and Scherzo; Berg, Excerpts from "Wozzeck"; Stoelzel, Concerto Grosso; Weinberger, Excerpts from "Schwanda." Under Mr. Toscanini: Kodaly, Marosszek Dances; Pizzetti, Introduction to "Agamemnon"; Chasins, Parade. Under Mr. Molinari: Respighi, Rossiniana.

Manhattan Symphony — Converse, "California"; Farwell, "Gods of the Mountain"; Hadley, "Streets of Peking," "Mirtil in Arcadia," "Halcyone"; Velazco, "Kaleidoscope."

Philadelphia Orchestra—Under Mr. Stokowski: Levidis, "Poeme Symphonique"; Prokofieff, "Pas d'Acier."

Manhattan Symphony, which, under Henry Hadley's direction, has a policy of giving at least one American work in each concert. The Philharmonic-Symphony gave five works by four American composers nineteen times, an increase of fourteen performances and three works over last season. The National Orchestral Association gave three American works by three composers; four American works by three composers were heard in the benefit series at the Roxy Theater, and the Boston and Cleveland Orchestras each gave one American work here this season. In all, the number of American works offered fell off by four from last season's figure, but the number of performances of American music increased by one.

American music also received representation in the junior concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Manhattan Symphony's concerts at St. George's Church, not included in the above enumeration.

The representation given the various composers in this past season's orchestral concerts in Manhattan, and the changes as compared to 1929-'30, may be found in the table included in this section. The large increase or decline in the number of performances afforded certain well known composers is probably far less significant than it looks, not representing any particular tendency in public taste. While the executives of an orchestra naturally avoid giving the public more than a moderate proportion of what it is not likely to want, there are other factors influencing program making, the whims of preferences of the conductors (which Mr. Pitts Sanborn, discussing the Philharmonic-Symphony season in "The New York World-Telegram," considered as the most influential factor), the need of diversifying the repertoire, whereby a work may be dropped in one season and brought forward again in the next, and, in the case of visiting orchestras, the repertoire of their home concerts. A conductor leading a subscription series for hearers who have paid in advance can consult his personal preferences more than a leader of a non-subscription series, such as the Roxy benefit concerts, who has to give each individual program a box-office appeal.

One programmatic feature of the season was the increased attention paid to the music of Sibelius. Tchaikovsky's representation reached a probably record low point for recent years.

* * *

On the eve of the opening of the 1930-'31 season the local orchestral line-up was virtually the same as at the close of the preceding season. The American Orchestral Society was disbanded in June, but was succeeded by the National Orchestral Association, with similar objects and policies. The new training group, under Leon Barzin, upheld the high standards of performance which it had inherited from the former organization under Chalmers Clifton. The Conductorless Symphony, which had planned a third season, announced in October that economic conditions would not make this possible, although it was hoped to resume operations at some later date. The other relatively new organization, the Manhattan Symphony, weathered its second regular season, and has announced dates for its third in 1931-'32. Dr. Hadley's programs had several interesting features, although a few of them proved a trifle lengthy or heterogeneous [illegible] already [illegible] nic-Symphia Orservative brought seven)

from all, of its fiftieth repertoire remains to be seen, but among those of major interest might be classed the excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" and Stravinsky's Psalm Symphony, a source of much discussion when presented here by Dr. Koussevitzky last winter. Among the most interesting new American works presented we might list Professor Hill's second symphony and Arthur Shepherd's "Horizons."

* * *

Among works classifiable as American, using the term to denote only this country, eleven works by nine composers were offered eleven times by

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
MAY 3 - 1931

Between the Leger Lines

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Received by Your Reviewer

DURING the week just passed this reviewer received the semi-centennial edition of the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. It is a detailed history of the orchestra since its formation in 1881 and gives the record of the various conductors, soloists and works. As soon as this reviewer has an opportunity to journey between the 400 pages, including the appendix, there may be some idea expressed here concerning this notable record.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
MAY 4

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

In appreciation of the interest shown by Serge Koussevitzky in Finnish music, especially that of Jan Sibelius, the president of Finland has conferred on him the highest Finnish decoration, the insignia of commander of the Order of the White Cross. The Boston Symphony has played six Sibelius symphonies under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DUBUQUE, IA.
TELEGRAPH HERALD
MAY 3 1931

* * *

The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practitsed musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAY

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES STAR
MAY 4 1931

At a recent Boston symphony concert the Prince and Princess of Japan had to sit in the gallery. What is mere royalty on Beacon Hill?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN
MAY 6 - 1931

A LOVER OF ORCHESTRAS.

Musical Editor of The Sun—Thank you for your article on the Boston Symphony Orchestra in yesterday's Sun. New York is fortunate that for so many years it has had the opportunity of hearing this organiza-

Musical Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HISTORY PUBLISHED BY HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

History of Boston Symphony Orchestra Published by Houghton Mifflin Company.

"The fiftieth year of the Symphony Orchestra will be rounded with the publication of a complete history of its half century," says the Transcript. Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe's 'Boston Symphony Orchestra,' published in 1914, brought such a chronicle to the beginning of the late war. He has now continued it through the troubled war-period to the withdrawal of Mr. Higginson from active control. Mr. J. N. Burk of the staff at Symphony Hall then takes the tale to the end of the current season.

"To this narrative appendices will add a detailed list, with dates, of the numbers played at the regular concerts of the orchestra from October, 1881, to May, 1931; a roster of the personnel through these fifty years; a roll of 'assisting artists.' Professor Bliss Perry's address at the recent concert in memory of Henry Lee Higginson will also be included."

The Houghton Mifflin Company are the publishers and the book was to be ready for issue last week according to previous announcement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
MAY 5 1931

At the final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra subscribers to the various series presented to Mr. Koussevitzky a wreath of olive leaves cut in gold, with a suitable inscription as a token of appreciation of his services. Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky sail today from New York, bound for France, and planning to return in September. Meanwhile from Symphony hall comes the announcement that when the next season opens there will be no changes in the personnel of the orchestra, at least so far as present indications go.

names, we will not attempt to guess. Plans for new orchestras also are likely to face a psychological handicap in the fate of certain previous projects. Too many announcements not progressing beyond the paper stage result in a certain scepticism even for better founded plans, and music lovers who bought tickets for a subscription series abandoned after the first concert or two will have to be convinced that no such fate will follow patronage of a new organization. A new orchestra, when it reaches the stage of announcing a subscription series, would be wise in furnishing some means of assurance that either all the concerts will be given or that the ticket holders will get their money back for those not taking place. Cases such as those which have occurred in recent years, not only among orchestras, when those holding tickets for abandoned series were merely told with regret that there were no funds to reimburse them, work hardship not only to the actual ticket holders but to the local musical world in general.

It may also be wondered, while welcoming new projects in the orchestral world, whether it would not be wiser for the sponsors to unite on one plan, concentrating their financial resources and thus securing a better assurance of success, instead of dividing available funds and patronage by duplication of effort.

Meanwhile, according to present indications, all will be quiet on the orchestral front until the inauguration of the thirteenth Stadium season nine weeks hence.

orchestras.

A number of years ago I lived near Philadelphia and the series of the Boston Symphony were concerts I remember with much pleasure. It is regrettable to me that these concerts have been discontinued and that there seems to be an attitude of hostility to symphony music other than that published by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia.

I am the last to say that the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra is not of the great elect. The wider the field, the broader should our vision be and the larger our capacity to enjoy that which is set before us.

L. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAY 1 1931

ELABORATE HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season. The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

MAY 1931

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its final week of the season at Symphony Hall in Boston this afternoon. Works by Beethoven, Wagner, Debussy and Richard Strauss will be played.

The New York Little Symphony, Hans Bruno Meyer conductor, will present a program of compositions by Gretry, Haydn, Elgar, Albeniz and the conductor himself at Roerich Hall tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

MAY 2 1931

ELABORATE HISTORY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

The new book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. de Wolfe Howe, will be issued this week, the last of the Symphony season. The book combines a revision of the narrative published in 1914, with new chapters carrying the fortunes of the orchestra through the 17 ensuing years. The complete lists of the works played, the soloists and the personnel through the 50th season are recorded.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

MAY 3 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD IN JAZZ PIECE

Introduces Popular Music During Concert Season in Massachusetts

Critics and music lovers debated today over the merits or demerits of the first 100 per cent jazz composition ever played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during a regular symphony season.

For half a century there had been a ritual-like atmosphere among audiences attending concerts of this 105-piece virtuoso orchestra, now led by the elegant and superbly-tailored Serge Koussevitzky. Such titillating numbers as George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" had been relegated to the popular or "pops" programs.

But in this golden jubilee year Koussevitzky has dared to bring echoes of tin pan alley within the limits of a symphony program, and even the most conservative auditors surrendered to the foot-shuffling impulse.

The piece, a jazz composition for orchestra, chorus and solo piano, was "Rio Grande," composed by the brilliant young Englishman, Constant Lambert, to a ragged-lined poem by Sacheverell Sitwell.

The composer left no doubt as to the jazz classification, using two trumpets, two French horns, three trombones, one bass tuba, percussion with five players, three kettle drums

"...they dance—
"On level bu...
the...
"Nor sing th...
"Whose sad n... gales,
"Till...they ...

...shurston, magician . . . photo
...where he has experimented wi...
...touch with distant plane...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 3 - 1931

THE SYMPHONIC SEASON: A RETROSPECTIVE VIEW

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WHEN the training orchestra of the National Orchestral Association, under Leon Barzin's direction, played the last note of Ravel's "Bolero," it also closed New York's orchestral season of 1930-'31, as far as large orchestras are concerned, unless some as yet unscheduled concerts of this type should take place before the Philharmonic-Symphony's musicians reassemble early in July to open the annual symphonic season at the Lewisohn Stadium.

As before, the major part of the season's local orchestral activities was provided by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which gave 114 concerts in its various subscription series in New York and Brooklyn. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave ten concerts at Carnegie Hall and five in Brooklyn, the Philadelphia Orchestra again gave a series of ten concerts here, nine of a primarily orchestral type. The Manhattan Symphony again offered ten concerts, which makes the subscription total of concerts of a strictly orchestral character 148, as compared with 154 last season.

The Philharmonic-Symphony also gave its usual two concerts for the benefit of its pension fund, and its members also took part in the annual concert presenting the Schubert memorial's soloists. The Cleveland Orchestra gave its annual Carnegie Hall concert; two new organizations each offered a performance, while the Roxy Orchestra, enlarged to nearly 200 members for this series, gave fourteen Sunday morning concerts at the Roxy Theater for the benefit of unemployed musicians, offering programs mainly of standard orchestral works. A new Brooklyn orchestra, the Symphony Society of Brooklyn, gave two performances, increasing the total to 170 concerts, the same figure as last season's on a similar basis. Orchestral works were also played in certain concerts of the Society of the Friends of Music, but all its concerts this season belong to the choral rather than the orchestral class.

On a more inclusive basis, we can count in the two performances of Stravinsky and Prokofieff stage works given by the Philadelphia Orchestra with the League of Composers. Adding the twenty-four opera concerts at the Metropolitan, which included orchestral numbers, our total becomes 196 concerts by large professional orchestras for which tickets were sold. The corresponding total last season was 201; for 1928-'29, 168; for 1927-'28, 220.

The National Orchestral Association gave eight concerts for its subscribing members. Free concerts, including the eight given at the Metropolitan Art Museum under the direction of David Mannes, and the three given by the Manhattan Symphony in St. George's Church, concerts by two orchestras in the Borough of Queens and concerts in various parts of the city by amateur semi-professional, junior and student orchestras would also have to be enumerated to give a comprehensive statistical picture of the amount of public music making furnished during the season by orchestras numbering fifty or more players.

* * *

Works new to New York, not counting direct transcriptions, offered by the various orchestras during the last season in concerts for the paying public included the following:

Philharmonic-Symphony—Under Mr. Kleiber: Hindemith, Overture to "Neues vom Tage"; Krenek, Little Symphony; Lopatnikoff, Introduction and Scherzo; Berg, Excerpts from "Wozzeck"; Stoelzel, Concerto Grosso; Weinberger, Excerpts from "Schwanda." Under Mr. Toscanini: Kodaly, Marosszek Dances; Pizzetti, Introduction to "Agamemnon"; Chasins, Parade. Under Mr. Molinari: Respighi, Rossiniana.

Manhattan Symphony — Converse, "California"; Farwell, "Gods of the Mountain"; Hadley, "Streets of Peking," "Mirtil in Arcadia," "Halcyone"; Velazco, "Kaleidoscope."

Philadelphia Orchestra—Under Mr. Stokowski: Levidis, "Poeme Symphonique"; Prokofieff, "Pas d'Acier." Under Mr. Gabrilowitsch: Hausegger, "Aufklänge"; Klenau, "Hampstead Heath."

Boston Symphony—Hill, Symphony No. 2; Honegger, symphony; Nabokov, "Lyric" Symphony; Roussel, Symphony in G minor; Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes," Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

Cleveland Orchestra—Mosoloff, "Factory"; Shepherd, "Horizons."

National Orchestral Association — Maganini, "Night on an Island of Phantasy"; Paniagua, "Mayan Legend."

This makes twenty-nine novelties, as compared with thirty-nine last season and thirty-six in 1928-'29. How many of them, if any, will be more or less permanently adopted into the regular repertoire remains to be seen, but among those of major interest might be classed the excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" and Stravinsky's Psalm Symphony, a source of much discussion when presented here by Dr. Koussevitzky last winter. Among the most interesting new American works presented we might list Professor Hill's second symphony and Arthur Shepherd's "Horizons."

* * *

Among works classifiable as American, using the term to denote only this country, eleven works by nine composers were offered eleven times by the Manhattan Symphony, which, under Henry Hadley's direction, has a policy of giving at least one American work in each concert. The Philharmonic-Symphony gave five works by four American composers nineteen times, an increase of fourteen performances and three works over last season. The National Orchestral Association gave three American works by three composers; four American works by three composers were heard in the benefit series at the Roxy Theater, and the Boston and Cleveland Orchestras each gave one American work here this season. In all, the number of American works offered fell off by four from last season's figure, but the number of performances of American music increased by one.

American music also received representation in the junior concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Manhattan Symphony's concerts at St. George's Church, not included in the above enumeration.

The representation given the various composers in this past season's orchestral concerts in Manhattan, and the changes as compared to 1929-'30, may be found in the table included in this section. The large increase or decline in the number of performances afforded certain well known composers is probably far less significant than it looks, not representing any particular tendency in public taste. While the executives of an orchestra naturally avoid giving the public more than a moderate proportion of what it is not likely to want, there are other factors influencing program making, the whims of preferences of the conductors (which Mr. Pitts Sanborn, discussing the Philharmonic-Symphony season in "The New York World-Telegram," considered as the most influential factor), the need of diversifying the repertoire, whereby a work may be dropped in one season and brought forward again in the next, and, in the case of visiting orchestras, the repertoire of their home concerts. A conductor leading a subscription series for hearers who have paid in advance can consult his personal preferences more than a leader of a non-subscription series, such as the Roxy benefit concerts, who has to give each individual program a box-office appeal.

One programmatic feature of the season was the increased attention paid to the music of Sibelius. Tchaikovsky's representation reached a probably record low point for recent years.

* * *

On the eve of the opening of the 1930-'31 season the local orchestral line-up was virtually the same as at the close of the preceding season. The American Orchestral Society was disbanded in June, but was succeeded by the National Orchestral Association, with similar objects and policies. The new training group, under Leon Barzin, upheld the high standards of performance which it had inherited from the former organization under Chalmers Clifton. The Conductorless Symphony, which had planned a third season, announced in October that economic conditions would not make this possible, although it was hoped to resume operations at some later date. The other relatively new organization, the Manhattan Symphony, weathered its second regular season, and has announced dates for its third in 1931-'32. Dr. Hadley's programs had several interesting features, although a few of them proved a trifle lengthy, or heterogeneously assorted. Comment have already been offered on the Philharmonic-Symphony season. The Philadelphia Orchestra gave us a relatively conservative series; the Boston Symphony brought to New York some, but far from all, of the new works composed for its fiftieth home season.

(Continued from page seven)

* * *

There have been several announcements since last October of plans to form new orchestras, although these have not, thus far, resulted in many concerts. The Civic Symphony of New York made a preliminary announcement last fall and a more definite one this spring, when Cesare Sodero was named as its conductor, although it has not yet embarked on actual concert-giving. The Co-operative Symphony Orchestra, organized with Mischa Guterson as conductor, with the object of aiding unemployed musicians, gave one concert on January 3, but has announced no further activities. Under Theophil Wendt, the New York City Symphony Orchestra made a promising debut on March 21, but also has announced no future plans. Another orchestral project, with Paul Eisler as conductor, was made known in January.

New orchestras, if of adequate artistic capabilities and on a sufficiently firm economic basis to weather their first season or two, are to be welcomed, although we are inclined to doubt the existence of a "music-hungry" public, at least a public that has merely to see the announcement of an orchestral concert by a new organization in order to attend it in large numbers. We are inclined to believe that, while our orchestral public will throng to hear performances under the direction of Messrs. Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussevitzky, they are likely to wait for a new organization to get a reputation before affording it consistently large patronage.

How much this may be due to a high and exacting standard and how much to the attraction of famous names, we will not attempt to guess. Plans for new orchestras also are likely to face a psychological handicap in the fate of certain previous projects. Too many announcements not progressing beyond the paper stage result in a certain scepticism even for better founded plans, and music lovers who bought tickets for a subscription series abandoned after the first concert or two will have to be convinced that no such fate will follow patronage of a new organization. A new orchestra, when it reaches the stage of announcing a subscription series, would be wise in furnishing some means of assurance that either all the concerts will be given or that the ticket holders will get their money back for those not taking place. Cases such as those which have occurred in recent years, not only among orchestras, when those holding tickets for abandoned series were merely told with regret that there were no funds to reimburse them, work hardship not only to the actual ticket holders but to the local musical world in general.

It may also be wondered, while welcoming new projects in the orchestral world, whether it would not be wiser for the sponsors to unite on one plan, concentrating their financial resources and thus securing a better assurance of success, instead of dividing available funds and patronage by duplication of effort.

Meanwhile, according to present indications, all will be quiet on the orchestral front until the inauguration of the thirteenth Stadium season nine weeks hence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 3 - 1931

Between the Leger Lines

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Received by Your Reviewer

DURING the week just passed this reviewer received the semi-centennial edition of the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. It is a detailed history of the orchestra since its formation in 1881 and gives the record of the various conductors, soloists and works. As soon as this reviewer has an opportunity to journey between the 400 pages, including the appendix, there may be some idea expressed here concerning this notable record.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

MAY 4

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

In appreciation of the interest shown by Serge Koussevitzky in Finnish music, especially that of Jan Sibelius, the president of Finland has conferred on him the highest Finnish decoration, the insignia of commander of the Order of the White Cross. The Boston Symphony has played six Sibelius symphonies under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DUBUQUE, IA.
TELEGRAPH HERALD

MAY 3 1931

* * *

The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practitsed musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAY

THE L...

News

...n play, first prize being won b...
...Miss Mary-Ann Swasey and conso...
...ation by Miss Helen Hamlin. Re...freshments were served at the ...small tables after the play.
Other guests were Miss Mavis ...Curtis, Miss Norma Hinds, Miss ...Florence Ogden, Miss Dawn Or...utt, Miss Virginia Moulton, Mis...Marcella Shapiro, Miss Charlotte ...utts, Miss Ruth Benham, Miss ...Dagmar Augustinus, Miss Evelyn ...Rolfe and Miss Eleanor Wilson.

* * *

...HS JUNIOR SENIOR ...TO BE HELD FRIDAY

The Jordan ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

MAY 5 1931

At the final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra subscribers to the various series presented to Mr. Koussevitzky a wreath of olive leaves cut in gold, with a suitable inscription as a token of appreciation of his services. Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky sail today from New York, bound for France, and planning to return in September. Meanwhile from Symphony hall comes the announcement that when the next season opens there will be no changes in the personnel of the orchestra, at least so far as present indications go.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES STAR

MAY 4 193...

At a recent Boston symphony concert the Prince and Princess of Japan had to sit in the gallery. What is mere royalty on Beacon Hill?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAY 6 1931

A LOVER OF ORCHESTRAS.

Musical Editor of The Sun—Thank you for your article on the Boston Symphony Orchestra in yesterday's Sun. New York is fortunate that for so many years it has had the opportunity of hearing this organization which has always stood for the highest in its field.

I am one of those who recall their troubles during and subsequent to the world war. Your tribute to Mr. Monteux for building a solid foundation from which Mr. Koussevitzky was able to reach the heights of the past season was a fine tribute and richly deserved.

As to whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best, I agree with you, is beside the point. The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in New York, the Philadelphia Symphony here, and the Boston Symphony are all great enough to forget any idea of rivalry or which conductor is the greatest.

What New York should be really grateful for is the opportunity it has for hearing these orchestras frequently during the season, together with occasional concerts by the Cincinnati, Detroit and Cleveland orchestras.

A number of years ago I lived near Philadelphia and the series of the Boston Symphony were concerts I remember with much pleasure. It is regrettable to me that these concerts have been discontinued and that there seems to be an attitude of hostility to symphony music other than that published by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia.

I am the last to say that the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra is not of the great elect. The wider the field, the broader should our vision be and the larger our capacity to enjoy that which is set before us.

L. S.

196

Oratorio Socie

FIFTY YEARS OF A GREAT ORCHESTRA

May 3 NY Sunday Tribune

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT IS half a century since that resolute and intelligent Macaenas, Henry L. Higginson, aroused the citizens of Boston by issuing a statement in which he set forth in detail his plan for supplying the capital of Massachusetts with a permanent symphony orchestra. His intention, he announced, was "to hire an orchestra of sixty men and a conductor [there were seventy-four at the opening concert of October 22, 1881] paying them all by the year," reserving to himself "the right to all their time needed for rehearsals and for concerts, and allowing them to give lessons when they had time." The orchestra was "to give in Boston as many serious concerts of classical music as were wanted, and also to give at other times, and more especially in the summer, concerts of a lighter kind of music, in which should be included good dance music; to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable, but certainly to give Harvard University all that she needs in this line, to keep the prices low always, and especially where the lighter concerts are in question, because to them may come the poorer people; 50 cents and 25 cents being the measure of prices."

Last night in Boston the orchestra of which Henry L. Higginson dreamed, which he brought into being, which he developed and cherished for more than a generation, concluded its fiftieth season.

The great Mr. Higginson, could he have been present in the flesh to take a bow from the platform of Symphony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, might have been pardoned for feeling satisfied with the issue of his labors and his dreams. He would have been justified in telling himself (though it is difficult to fancy his doing so) that he had been a prime agent in the accomplishment of that ideal which he exposed in the earlier days of the Orchestra's existence when he said: "The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it and educate it, as well as fight for it; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen."

That duty, no one more devotedly and unselfishly discharged than Henry Higginson. "I have had my day," he wrote, shortly before his death, to his friend Judge Cabot, "and have had great comfort from the Orchestra." One can believe that, as he added, the burden had become "almost intolerable": it must indeed have seemed so in the tragic spring of 1918; but one likes to fancy that before he came to his end, a year and a half later, the comfort had begun to seem more memorable than the burden.

The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly throughout its existence for those esthetic virtues which not only contribute to the glory of musical art, but which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express. Other makers of music amongst us, other musical institutions—certain of them august and pretentious and, alas, unashamed—have sometimes lowered their standards, have compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instance of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prodigious effort made and sustained by Higginson was, as he expressed it, "simply in the interest of good music." The Orchestra has had no other aim throughout its half-century of existence.

* * *

Before the B. S. O.

THERE were, of course, orchestral concerts in Boston long before the organization created by Mr. Higginson came into being. The record of those given, for example, by the Orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association in the '60s and '70s is an artistically honorable one. Yet the state of musical taste in Boston, as in otherwise cultivated American communities during the two decades following the Civil War, was of a sort which the enlightened concertgoers of today would find it hard to realize. When George Henschel, the Boston Orchestra's first conductor, performed in 1882 the Adagio of Brahms's Serenade in D, a critic likened it to "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot"; and the gentleman went on to express the wish that he and his generation might "die in peace," unperplexed by "this so-called future school of music." Wilhelm Gericke, who, as the second conductor to have charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra changed it from an aggregation of musicians into a real orchestra, wrote in later years that during the first performance in Boston of Brahms' Symphony in F (November 7, 1884) "the audience left the hall in hundreds." William Foster Apthorp has related that the only Boston musician of those earlier years who was really enthusiastic from the first over another Symphony of Brahms, the C minor, was B. J. Lang—to whom all honor! "The rest of us," said Apthorp, "followed him soon enough, I myself bringing up the rear, after six years or so. It took considerably longer than this, though, for Brahms to win anything like a firm foothold in Boston. It was the old story over again. Schumann had to fight long for recognition from the public; Wagner did anything but come, see, and conquer. Liszt and Berlioz frightened almost all listeners at first."

Concerning Wagner, it might be recalled that when the Orchestra on February 17, 1883, commemorated the death of the perturbing Richard, a writer for the Boston "Gazette" observed that "the whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt," he continued, "if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time" (the cacophonous dreariness in question consisting of the "Tristan" Prelude, Lohengrin's Farewell, the "Siegfried Idyl," Elisabeth's "Dich Theure Halle," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Pogner's Address, and the Prelude to "Parsifal.")

But if this seems to us deplorable, what are we to say in reading about the state of musical taste in Boston in the '50s? Mr. Apthorp has preserved an account of an orchestral concert given by the visiting Germania Orchestra at Music Hall, when one of the numbers was a "Railway Galop." For this occasion all the seats on the floor had been taken up (the small audience occupying the galleries); and during the performance of the "Railway Galop," "a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about (by clock-work) on the floor of the hall, with black cotton-wool smoke coming out of its funnel."

Three-quarters of a century later, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsored a railway piece, the depiction of the tonal locomotive was confined to the imaginative plane, and Monsieur Honegger's "Pacific 231" was permitted to stimulate the fancy of the concertgoers of 1924 without benefit of a visual complement.

* * *

The Orchestra and Public Taste

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S orchestra addresses audiences a good deal less naïve and a good deal more exacting than those of seventy-five or even fifty years ago. Mr. Higginson's conception of the sort of music admissible to a symphony program was a high one for the early '80s. "Anything unworthy," he wrote in 1881, "is to be shut out." According to the lights of those times, it was shut out. Yet it is impossible to conceive of Mr. Koussevitzky offering the audiences of 1931 such music as found admission now and again to the Boston Symphony programs of earlier days—Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," for instance, performed under Henschel in 1882, or the songs by A. Goring Thomas exhibited by Mme. Julie Moran-Wyman, with piano accompaniment, at a concert conducted by Gericke in 1888.

Those works were not then adjudged "unworthy," and their presentation involved no decline from Mr. Higginson's ideal. The point to stress is not merely the progressive elevation and refinement of public taste which has relegated such music to its proper place, but the much more striking fact that it was precisely such agencies of popular culture as the Boston Symphony Orchestra (and, in New York, the orchestras conducted by Theodore Thomas and Leopold Damrosch) that created and developed the public taste by which their own activities were ultimately approved. It was an act of genuine faith and courage for Henschel to offer the audiences of 1881 the C minor Symphony of Brahms, and to subject them a year later, in the orchestra's second season, to the "cacophonous dreariness" of the Prelude to "Tristan." In so doing he was adhering to an exalted tradition. "I do not like Wagner's music, and take little interest in much of the newer composers," Mr. Higginson had declared frankly in his announcement of 1881; "but," he added, "I should not like to bar them out of our programs." One remembers the attachment of another great and liberal citizen of Boston, Justice Holmes, to that principle which he defined as "freedom of thought not for those who agree with us, but freedom for the thought that we hate."

* * *

Instructing the Unwilling

A CONSTANT recognition of the truth that a great orchestra is obligated to function unceasingly not alone as a custodian but as a herald and a prophet, has guided the activities of the Boston organization from the start. Obedient to the more dangerous clause of this obligation, Henschel brought forward Brahms; Gericke ventured Bruckner and Strauss (during the first

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN
MAY 2 - 1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra spent most of last winter celebrating its fiftieth anniversary. All sorts and conditions of composers spoiled pages and pages of good score paper in honor of the event and some almost important music was composed. Stravinsky, of course, led the procession with his symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization. Mr. Koussevitzy, who surely loves us New Yorkers as we love him, permitted us to hear several of the compositions made for the prolonged festival. Some of them we shall probably hear again and others we shall not.

One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Company. The work is not entirely new; but this edition has been revised and brought up to date. It is naturally a vital contribution to the musical history of this country. Its pages teem with interesting matter about the distinguished founder of the orchestra and the various conductors who have presided over its artistic activities. Not the least sympathetic portion is that dealing with the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henschel after fifty years.

Henschel was the first wielder of its baton and it was a happy fortune that at eighty years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, making but one change in it. Not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present. But there was the old conductor, still a great musician and an object of veneration to Boston's army of concert devotees.

There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given to them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the East fill the stage of Carnegie Hall.

* * *

New York Sits Up.

THERE was real excitement in the old Steinway Hall down in Fourteenth street, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke, of whom perhaps more may be said later. The opening number was the "Oberon" overture. At its close there was an outburst of cheering. The triumph was due chiefly to the splendid body of strings, which proclaimed the richness of the finale with an effect greatly heightened by the peculiarly brilliant and sonorous acoustics of the old hall.

There was some hesitation in the critical comments of the following day, but the consensus of opinion disclosed a feeling that there was going to be a revision of local orchestral standards. The suggestion that the wood winds of the orchestra were not up to the level of the strings was accepted by Mr. Gericke in good part. He brought from the Paris Opera Comique for the next season a new flute and a new oboe who worked a beneficial change in the wood section. To keep up with a string body headed by Franz Kneisel and Charles Martin Loeffler was not an easy matter.

There was an impression at the time that the audience in Steinway Hall consisted largely, if not altogether, of Bostonians. This is an exaggeration. Of course, Massachusetts was well represented, but the music lovers of this village were very curious about the invaders. The cheering in the rear of the hall after the overture was led by a short man with bushy hair and a stubby mustache, who leaped upon his chair and shouted lustily. His name was Raphael Joseffy.

There is not much cheering at Boston concerts now, but the behavior of the box office is worth a thousand shouts. The period of artistic depression which came with the war is long past and the orchestra has risen to an imposing level. Present holders of seats may not recall clearly the troubles of the war days which are recounted admirably by Mr. Howe. All the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than thirty new men were engaged. The ensemble was disrupted and in fact a new machine had to be put together. And at the same moment the salary question obtruded itself and the orchestra threatened a strike. The victim of these circumstances was Pierre Monteux. This music lover never was convinced that M. Monteux was a great conductor; but that he was a good drill master and a competent executive could never be doubted. He faced his troubles courageously and by dint of hard and intelligent labor succeeded in restoring the orchestra to something like its former excellence. Certainly he should have the credit of leaving to Mr. Koussevitzky the well-tuned instrument upon which he now performs symphonic music with such skill.

* * *

Col. Henry L. Higginson.

THERE is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Col. Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Col. Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music. He set out to rear an edifice more lasting than brick or stone, and whether music as we now know it must succumb to the influence of the machine or the newly developed taste which prefers nervous shocks to serene contemplation, the history of the Boston orchestra will endure as a demonstration of the fact that out of a race of barbarians, as seen by G. K. Chesterton, there came at least one man with a devotion to the loftiest artistic ideals.

Col. Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. Naturally, he did not act without consulting others, but he moved in the end with decision, though with caution. That he was not always fortunate cannot be denied. Mr. Howe has been lenient in his treatment of some of the conductors, undoubtedly because he recognized the fact that not one of them was without some individual merit. But there were certain generals of the little army who were almost in the rough rider class.

The writer journeyed to Boston to be present at the debut of one of them. The first number on the program was Beethoven's fifth symphony. The conductor caused the introductory measures which publish the principal theme to be played violently and with long holds on the final tone. Those measures revealed completely the character of the conductor and the style which was to be expected from him at all times. When the intermission was reached and many of us moved out into the corridors to meet acquaintances, Ben Woolf, composer and critic, came up smiling and remarked: "Well, tonight Fate kicked the door clear in." But Col. Higginson gave us Gericke, Nikisch and Muck. He died before Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzy.

* * *

A Truly Great Orchestra.

MR. HOWE has placed the musical world under a debt of gratitude by bringing his work up to date. Boston has always held a peculiarly influential position in the center of musical activities in this country. The city is not now and never was an operatic community. Boston's musical culture has radiated from the symphony concerts and has enjoyed the benefit of a sound basis. There has been very little scope for sensationalism, even if there had been a desire for it. There has been even less in recent years since the appearance of soloists has been made rare. The orchestra is Boston's own splendid virtuoso and upon the beauty and eloquence of its playing the city depends for its most intense musical enjoyment.

The writer has frequently been asked if the Boston organization performance of the latter's "Aus Italien" the auditors "walked out by platoons"); Muck presented "La Mer" of Debussy—though he is known to have had no love for that composer—and the even less accessible "Five Orchestral Pieces" of Schönberg. Monteux exhibited Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du Printemps" in the days before they had become accepted modern classics. As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he has been sleeplessly on the trail of the significant and the innovating, indifferent to the certainty that they would affront inhospitable ears, disregarding the indignant subscriber who wrote to a newspaper, "I refuse to pay more than a nickel for subway noises."

The orchestra continues in its triumphant present what Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle* so felicitously calls "the old story of the instruction of the unwilling—the gradual and difficult direction of desire."

We have observed before, and it is pertinent to observe again, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of esthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nutured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half century of material conquests.

*"The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. Semicentennial edition. Revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston and New York, 1931.

196

Oratorio Socie

Fifty Years of a Great Orchestra

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT IS half a century since that resolute and intelligent Macaenas, Henry L. Higginson, aroused the citizens of Boston by issuing a statement in which he set forth in detail his plan for supplying the capital of Massachusetts with a permanent symphony orchestra. His intention, he announced, was "to hire an orchestra of sixty men and a conductor [there were seventy-four at the opening concert of October 22, 1881] paying them all by the year," reserving to himself "the right to all their time needed for rehearsals and for concerts, and allowing them to give lessons when they had time." The orchestra was "to give in Boston as many serious concerts of classical music as were wanted, and also to give at other times, and more especially in the summer, concerts of a lighter kind of music, in which should be included good dance music; to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable, but certainly to give Harvard University all that she needs in this line, to keep the prices low always, and especially where the lighter concerts are in question, because to them may come the poorer people; 50 cents and 25 cents being the measure of prices."

Last night in Boston the orchestra of which Henry L. Higginson dreamed, which he brought into being, which he developed and cherished for more than a generation, concluded its fiftieth season.

The great Mr. Higginson, could he have been present in the flesh to take a bow from the platform of Symphony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, might have been pardoned for feeling satisfied with the issue of his labors and his dreams. He would have been justified in telling himself (though it is difficult to fancy his doing so) that he had been a prime agent in the accomplishment of that ideal which he exposed in the earlier days of the Orchestra's existence when he said: "The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it and educate it, as well as fight for it; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen."

That duty, no one more devotedly and unselfishly discharged than Henry Higginson. "I have had my day," he wrote, shortly before his death, to his friend Judge Cabot, "and have had great comfort from the Orchestra." One can believe that, as he added, the burden had become "almost intolerable": it must indeed have seemed so in the tragic spring of 1918; but one likes to fancy that before he came to his end, a year and a half later, the comfort had begun to seem more memorable than the burden.

The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly throughout its existence for those esthetic virtues which not only contribute to the glory of musical art, but which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express. Other makers of music amongst us, other musical institutions—certain of them august and pretentious and, alas, unashamed—have sometimes lowered their standards, have compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instance of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prodigious effort made and sustained by Higginson was, as he expressed it, "simply in the interest of good music." The Orchestra has had no other aim throughout its half-century of existence.

* * *

Before the B. S. O.

THERE were, of course, orchestral concerts in Boston long before the organization created by Mr. Higginson came into being. The record of those given, for example, by the Orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association in the '60s and '70s is an artistically honorable one. Yet the state of musical taste in Boston, as in otherwise cultivated American communities during the two decades following the Civil War, was of a sort which the enlightened concertgoers of today would find it hard to realize. When George Henschel, the Boston Orchestra's first conductor, performed in 1882 the Adagio of Brahms's Serenade in D, a critic likened it to "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot"; and the gentleman went on to express the wish that he and his generation might "die in peace," unperplexed by "this so-called future school of music." Wilhelm Gericke, who, as the second conductor to have charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra changed it from an aggregation of musicians into a real orchestra, wrote in later years that during the first performance in Boston of Brahms' Symphony in F (November 7, 1884) "the audience left the hall in hundreds." William Foster Apthorp has related that the only Boston musician of those earlier years who was really enthusiastic from the first over another Symphony of Brahms, the C minor, was B. J. Lang—to whom all honor! "The rest of us," said Apthorp, "followed him soon enough, I myself bringing up the rear, after six years or so. It took considerably longer than this, though, for Brahms to win anything like a firm foothold in Boston. It was the old story over again. Schumann had to fight long for recognition from the public; Wagner did anything but come, see, and conquer. Liszt and Berlioz frightened almost all listeners at first."

Concerning Wagner, it might be recalled that when the Orchestra on February 17, 1883, commemorated the death of the perturbing Richard, a writer for the Boston "Gazette" observed that "the whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt," he continued, "if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time" (the cacophonous dreariness in question consisting of the "Tristan" Prelude, Lohengrin's Farewell, the "Siegfried Idyl," Elisabeth's "Dich Theure Halle," the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and Pogner's Address, and the Prelude to "Parsifal.")

But if this seems to us deplorable, what are we to say in reading about the state of musical taste in Boston in the '50s? Mr. Apthorp has preserved an account of an orchestral concert given by the visiting Germania Orchestra at Music Hall, when one of the numbers was a "Railway Galop." For this occasion all the seats on the floor had been taken up (the small audience occupying the galleries); and during the performance of the "Railway Galop," "a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about (by clock-work) on the floor of the hall, with black cotton-wool smoke coming out of its funnel."

Three-quarters of a century later, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsored a railway piece, the depiction of the tonal locomotive was confined to the imaginative plane, and Monsieur Honegger's "Pacific 231" was permitted to stimulate the fancy of the concertgoers of 1924 without benefit of a visual complement.

* * *

The Orchestra and Public Taste

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S orchestra addresses audiences a good deal less naïve and a good deal more exacting than those of seventy-five or even fifty years ago. Mr. Higginson's conception of the sort of music admissible to a symphony program was a high one for the early '80s. "Anything unworthy," he wrote in 1881, "is to be shut out." According to the lights of those times, it was shut out. Yet it is impossible to conceive of Mr. Koussevitzky offering the audiences of 1931 such music as found admission now and again to the Boston Symphony programs of earlier days—Gounod's "Funeral ~~Marches~~ of a Marionette," for instance, performed under Henschel

(Continued on page nine)

George Elmer Browne is opening exhibition on Tuesday at the Gr Central Galleries, consisting of re water colors. At the Arden gal there is a showing of decorative pa ings by George Ashley which will main throughout the month.

A number of interesting portraits H. Willard Ortlip are being shown the Fifteen gallery in company w still life paintings by Aimee E. Ortl This is the third New York exhibiti the two have held in as many yea the former appearances having be made at the Art Center. Mr. Ortl besides painting portraits of conve tional size and character, has comple several striking group arrangement including in one instance as many as six figures. This portrait of "Mrs. Harold Leinbach and Children" is treated in a happy illustrative vein, showing a charming young mother escorting her equally charming family of boys and girls on a picnic party. In this and other similar groups Mr. Ortlip catches skilfully the spirit of vivacity and movement in his subjects, giving them a fairly authentic embodiment of

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN
MAY 2 - 1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra spent most of last winter celebrating its fiftieth anniversary. All sorts and conditions of composers spoiled pages and pages of good score paper in honor of the event and some almost important music was composed. Stravinsky, of course, led the procession with his symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization. Mr. Koussevitzy, who surely loves us New Yorkers as we love him, permitted us to hear several of the compositions made for the prolonged festival. Some of them we shall probably hear again and others we shall not.

One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Company. The work is not entirely new; but this edition has been revised and brought up to date. It is naturally a vital contribution to the musical history of this country. Its pages teem with interesting matter about the distinguished founder of the orchestra and the various conductors who have presided over its artistic activities. Not the least sympathetic portion is that dealing with the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henschel after fifty years.

Henschel was the first wielder of its baton and it was a happy fortune that at eighty years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, making but one change in it. Not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present. But there was the old conductor, still a great musician and an object of veneration to Boston's army of concert devotees.

There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given to them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the East fill the stage of Carnegie Hall.

* * *

New York Sits Up.

THERE was real excitement in the old Steinway Hall down in Fourteenth street, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke, of whom perhaps more may be said later. The opening number was the "Oberon" overture. At its close there was an outburst of cheering. The triumph was due chiefly to the splendid body of strings, which proclaimed the richness of the finale with an effect greatly heightened by the peculiarly brilliant and sonorous acoustics of the old hall.

There was some hesitation in the critical comments of the following day, but the consensus of opinion disclosed a feeling that there was going to be a revision of local orchestral standards. The suggestion that the wood winds of the orchestra were not up to the level of the strings was accepted by Mr. Gericke in good part. He brought from the Paris Opera Comique for the next season a new flute and a new oboe who worked a beneficial change in the wood section. To keep up with a string body headed by Franz Kneisel and Charles Martin Loeffler was not an easy matter.

There was an impression at the time that the audience in Steinway Hall consisted largely, if not altogether, of Bostonians. This is an exaggeration. Of course, Massachusetts was well represented, but the music lovers of this village were very curious about the invaders. The cheering in the rear of the hall after the overture was led by a short man with bushy hair and a stubby mustache, who leaped upon his chair and shouted lustily. His name was Raphael Joseffy.

There is not much cheering at Boston concerts now, but the behavior of the box office is worth a thousand shouts. The period of artistic depression which came with the war is long past and the orchestra has risen to an imposing level. Present holders of seats may not recall clearly the troubles of the war days which are recounted admirably by Mr. Howe. All the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than thirty new men were engaged. The ensemble was disrupted and in fact a new machine had to be put together. And at the same moment the salary question obtruded itself and the orchestra threatened a strike. The victim of these circumstances was Pierre Monteux. This music lover never was convinced that M. Monteux was a great conductor; but that he was a good drill master and a competent executive could never be doubted. He faced his troubles courageously and by dint of hard and intelligent labor succeeded in restoring the orchestra to something like its former excellence. Certainly he should have the credit of leaving to Mr. Koussevitzky the well-tuned instrument upon which he now performs symphonic music with such skill.

* * *

Col. Henry L. Higginson.

THERE is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Col. Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Col. Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music. He set out to rear an edifice more lasting than brick or stone, and whether music as we now know it must succumb to the influence of the machine or the newly developed taste which prefers nervous shocks to serene contemplation, the history of the Boston orchestra will endure as a demonstration of the fact that out of a race of barbarians, as seen by G. K. Chesterton, there came at least one man with a devotion to the loftiest artistic ideals.

Col. Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. Naturally, he did not act without consulting others, but he moved in the end with decision, though with caution. That he was not always fortunate cannot be denied. Mr. Howe has been lenient in his treatment of some of the conductors, undoubtedly because he recognized the fact that not one of them was without some individual merit. But there were certain generals of the little army who were almost in the rough rider class.

The writer journeyed to Boston to be present at the debut of one of them. The first number on the program was Beethoven's fifth symphony. The conductor caused the introductory measures which publish the principal theme to be played violently and with long holds on the final tone. Those measures revealed completely the character of the conductor and the style which was to be expected from him at all times. When the intermission was reached and many of us moved out into the corridors to meet acquaintances, Ben Woolf, composer and critic, came up smiling and remarked: "Well, tonight Fate kicked the door clear in." But Col. Higginson gave us Gericke, Nikisch and Muck. He died before Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzy.

* * *

A Truly Great Orchestra.

MR. HOWE has placed the musical world under a debt of gratitude by bringing his work up to date. Boston has always held a peculiarly influential position in the center of musical activities in this country. The city is not now and never was an operatic community. Boston's musical culture has radiated from the symphony concerts and has enjoyed the benefit of a sound basis. There has been very little scope for sensationalism, even if there had been a desire for it. There has been even less in recent years since the appearance of soloists has been made rare. The orchestra is Boston's own splendid virtuoso and upon the beauty and eloquence of its playing the city depends for its most intense musical enjoyment.

The writer has frequently been asked if the Boston organization was not the best in the country. The answer is that he does not know and would not tell if he did. It is a bad American habit to ask who is the best singer, violinist, pianist or actor and then refuse to support any other. As far as the Boston orchestra is concerned it should be enough for any one of us to be convinced that it is without a superior. That we may venture to say, although we have not recently heard the Chicago ensemble. The substantial fact is that this is a great orchestra conducted with enthusiasm and brilliant musicianship by one of the foremost conductors of this time.

There were concerts last winter in which the orchestra rose to thrilling power, to a magnificence of tone impossible to surpass, and to a certainty and finish of technic arousing the admiration of every hearer. That we had to listen to some feeble compositions was due to the conductor's general invitation to the most prominent composers to contribute items to the anniversary. Mr. Koussevitzky got the best that was procurable, and should not be blamed because some of it was hardly worth while.

The Bostonians will next season begin their second half century. May they be as successful at its conclusion as they are now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 9 - 1931

Boston Symphony's Story Is Brilliantly Related by M. A. DeWolfe Howe

Famous Musical Organization and Its Unique Position in America Traced from Its Founding in 1881 by Higginson.

By PITTS SANBORN.

THIS is a period of biography, of a "New Biography" that psychoanalyzes its subjects and, wherever the material runs short, supplies the lack with ready fiction. It is a period of biographical epigrammatists, who select an angle of approach and never budge from it though truth be thrice a liar. It is a period of interpretations of an accepted set of facts which may turn out as antipodal as those pronounced in praise by Romain Rolland and in blame by Emil Ludwig upon Bettina von Arnim the friend of Goethe and of Beethoven. But at any rate the "new" biographers are never dull—at least superficially.

Before me is the biography not of a man but of an orchestra. I suppose it would be possible to "psyche" an orchestra, but it would not be easy. It is easier to probe the souls of the men who have made it. The orchestra, however, takes on with the years a life of its own, becomes a sentient, responsive entity. It is such a life that M. A. DeWolfe Howe recounts in the semicentennial edition of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin Co.), and he makes it as engrossing as any "new" biography in which the iniquities of Abraham Lincoln are vividly set forth or Lucretia Borgia is endowed with the chief attributes of sainthood.

* * *

Logical Subject For Such a Book.

THE Boston Symphony is the logical subject for such a book. It long held a unique position among American orchestras. Indeed, there were those who maintained that it was the finest orchestra in the world. The present century has witnessed the rise of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic (nearly forty years older than the Boston Orchestra, by the way) to dispute this primacy. Still the Boston remains, if no longer the admitted first, in any case second to none. Furthermore, during the greater part of its fifty years this orchestra was the personal property of one man, the late Henry Lee Higginson, who founded it in 1881 and cherished and sustained it until 1918.

Writing an "Account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" in October, 1911, Higginson explained the inception of his project:—"During some years of my youth, spent in Germany and especially in Austria, whither I went to study music, I conceived a hope to see an orchestra in Boston which should play as well as the great orchestras of Europe and give concerts at a reasonable price. . . . The end of the Civil War left me without an occupation or money and with a wife whom it was my first duty to support; so for many years my hope for music lay asleep. At last, in one or two years ending in 1880, luck had turned my way and enabled me to take up this project in earnest in 1881."

The result was, in words ascribed by Richard Aldrich to Higginson himself, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra became Higginson's yacht, his racing stable, his library, and his art gallery, or it took the place of what those things were to other men of wealth with other tastes. And so it continued until Higginson, then in his eighty-fifth year, laid down the burden of his own making during a peculiarly painful episode of the World War, to be succeeded by a committee of Bostonians headed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

* * *

Henschel First Conductor.

TO conduct the new orchestra Higginson chose a young musician of extraordinary gifts, though he lacked experience as a conductor, namely, Georg Henschel, who, as Sir George Henschel, returned to conduct last October the program (with a single exception) of the first concert of all in 1881. Says Mr. Howe:—"What other conductor, one wondered, has ever lived to do just this?

"Through rehearsals, concerts, receptions, he moved, buoyant, keen, tireless, his beat as sure as his step was springy. Time, taking no ravages, had but given this man a sharper musical zest, a broader understanding."

The inaugural program comprised Beethoven's overture "The Dedication of the House," an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," a symphony in B flat by Haydn (B. & H. No. 12), the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scena from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and Weber's "Festival" overture. For the last item Henschel fifty years later substituted the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Soloists are no longer the fashion of Boston Symphony concerts, but in earlier days they helped lure the public. On the inaugural occasion that distinguished American contralto, Annie Louise Cary, sang the numbers by Gluck and by Bruch.

In 1884 Wilhelm Gericke of the Vienna Court Opera succeeded Henschel. Gericke was a man of valuable experience and a remarkable drill master. After his second concert he remarked to Higginson:—"There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra." So he set out to make it one, and when he relinquished it in 1889 he had succeeded in raising it to the first rank. It was commonly and deservedly said:—"Gericke made our orchestra."

* * *

"Nothing Left for Me."

YET when Gericke reached Boston he was by no means prepared for what had already been done in the musical capital of America. The following illuminating anecdote was related by W. F. Apthorp, the eminent musical critic:—

"Shortly after Mr. Gericke's arrival in Boston, B. J. Lang asked him if he would not be interested to see the programs of past symphony concerts in our city; to which he replied he had already seen them all and studied them carefully. 'All' sounded rather startling; so Lang asked him how many seasons of programs he had seen. 'Oh, there have been only three,' answered Mr. Gericke.

"'Ah, I see,' said Lang, 'you mean the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but wouldn't you like to see the programs for the seventeen years of concerts given by the Harvard Musical Association, before the Symphony Orchestra existed?' Mr. Gericke's eyes opened wide at this, and he eagerly accepted the offer. So Lang gave him the two bound volumes of programs, which he returned in a few days, saying, 'I'm completely dumfounded! I do not see what is left for me to do here. You seem to have had everything already; more, much more, than we ever had in Vienna!'"

Gericke returned for the period from 1898 to 1906. During his absence Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur successively held sway. Nikisch, who was only 34 when he took up Gericke's baton, brought to the podium a new species of animal. He was America's first "prima donna of the baton." "It is credibly reported." Mr. Howe informs us, "that when Mr. Nikisch first heard the orchestra the technical beauty of its performance led him to exclaim:—'All I have to do is to poetize!' The results were inevitably telling." In fact, there was such a pouring of new wine into old bottles that Boston was profoundly stirred, and the public became as much exercised over the romantic and vigorous personality of the conductor as over the music that he directed.

* * *

Craze Abated in Time.

LITTLE dreaming what was eventually to happen on the rock-ribbed Island of Manhattan, a New York critic spoke of the "conductor cult" as a "phase of social activity which flourishes only in Boston." The regular morning salutation of Bostonians got to be, "Well, what do you think of Nikisch?" Eventually, however, the craze abated "and at the end of the season it was possible gently to criticise the new conductor without being stoned to death in Hamilton Place by infuriated buyers of season tickets." It seems that at the beginning of his first season in [illegible] Nikisch was much given to conducting without a score—a practice that some naive souls have supposed the invention of Arturo Toscanini.

The five years' reign of Emil Paur was altogether less noteworthy. Then Gericke came back for a second period of high distinction. His successor was Dr. Karl Muck, who occupied the podium from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918. Somebody whom Mr. Howe identifies only as "an accurate observer" wrote:— "Mr. Gericke left the Symphony Orchestra a perfect instrument; Dr. Muck has given it a living voice."

Greeted as an old friend upon his return in 1912, Dr. Muck, a conductor of splendid quality, presided over the orchestra with complete success until he was arrested and interned during the World War. Mr. Howe's comment on that mysterious and distressing occurrence is interesting:—"The agitation against the conductor as a German bore its fruits in his arrest by the federal government and his internment technically as an alien enemy, though on grounds that were never made public. In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy.

* * *

Restored Orchestra's Prestige.

THE reorganization of the orchestra after German citizens had been eliminated, the brief conductorship of the Frenchman Henri Rabaud and the longer one of another Frenchman, Pierre Monteux, who had to weather a smash-up of the personnel, are duly recounted. Finally we are treated to an enthusiastic chapter on Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian who came to the orchestra in 1924, restoring its prestige with the public of other cities as well as of Boston.

"Now," Mr. Howe says, "it is not hard to perceive a conservative tendency in this conductor who, being congenitally unable to rest upon assumptions, has developed much in the succession of seasons. His fires burn no less brilliantly, but he has stabilized them to a steadier glow. T[illegible] artist whom a London reviewer described as making the orchestra 'through hedges backwards' in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony has gi[illegible] whole festivals of Beethoven and Brahms in which there has been noticeable upsetting of academic decorum."

In an appendix is quoted the eloquent tribute to Higginson p[illegible] nounced by Bliss Perry in the course of the orchestra's recent Bach F[illegible] tival in Symphony Hall, Boston. Other appendices furnish invaluab[illegible] lists of the compositions played by the orchestra, the conductors an[illegible] members of the orchestra, and the soloists who have appeared with it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAY 12 1931

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

A Reprint, With Additions.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, by M. A. DeWolfe Howe; a revised and extended edition of a book published in 1914; commemorating the Fiftieth season of the Orchestra's work.

—

Through the courtesy of the Press Department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, The Observation Post finds itself possessed of a copy of the new and revised Howe history of the great organization, which includes the comprehensive work so admirably done carrying the full story of the Boston Symphony up to 1914, plus additional chapters covering the later seasons to the end of 1930-31 with revised appendices that give a complete list of all compositions played in the fifty seasons of the orchestra's life; a complete list of soloists appearing with the orchestra and a complete roster of the personnel from 1881 to 1931, inclusive. Furthermore the admirable address made by Bliss Perry on Henry Lee Higginson, at the beginning of the Bach Festival, in March of this year, has its proper inclusion in the book and there is an excellent index. All of which means that the new book should be immensely valuable for reference as well as interesting to all music lovers.

—

I wonder how many of the thousands who have heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play—unless they have read the Howe book in its 1914 or 1931 editions—realize that it is possible that they may owe their joy in the music in some measure to the "bleeder" (a barber) in Vienna 'way back in 1857, who essayed the cure of the recurring headaches of Henry Lee Higginson by taking eight ounces of that young man's blood from his left arm?

But it seems quite likely that that [illegible]ude surgery may have made Henry [illegible]ginson into a patron, instead of a [illegible]ctitioner, of the art of music; and [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra cer[illegible]nly came into life because Henry [illegible]ginson was the ideal patron of [illegible]sic of his time—a man of sure [illegible]on, culture and knowledge; pos[illegible]sed of wealth to make that vision [illegible]lity, that culture wide-spreading, [illegible]t knowledge to acquisition by [illegible]ers, unknown in numbers, while [illegible]great orchestra he founded shall [illegible]ure.

—

[illegible]fter that heroic bleeding young [illegible]ginson returned at once to strenu[illegible]s piano-practice, over-exerted his [illegible]bled arm, ruined his chances of [illegible]oming a player; then he traveled, [illegible]ied, thought and lived music [illegible]out producing it; and in 1860 [illegible]e back to Boston for the war[illegible]ce that gave him his well-won [illegible]ary title, went into the business [illegible] gave him his fortune, found him[illegible]in 1881 in a money-position that [illegible] him the choice of retirement [illegible] business activity and a life of [illegible]or the continuation of business [illegible]the founding and supporting of [illegible]nphony orchestra. The choice he [illegible] has been of immeasurable im[illegible]nce to the cause of music in [illegible]ica.

—

[illegible] Howe in his book traces the [illegible]y of the Boston Symphony Or[illegible]a in scholarly fashion through [illegible]ears; in the first season of the [illegible]stra there were twenty concerts [illegible]wenty public rehearsals under [illegible]e Henschel, and all was not [illegible]h sailing for the new orchestra [illegible]e new conductor, though both [illegible]

and Mr. Gericke had come the complainers found that they had a stern classicist to deal with. Programs had less "popular" appeal than ever; discipline in the orchestra was tighter; and here was a man who, when all arrangements had been made to take the orchestra to New York for its first appearance before a new and unfriendly public, was big enough to ask that the concert be cancelled "because the orchestra wasn't good enough." His first five-year term built up the orchestra amazingly; and he had a second reign of eight years beginning in 1898. Incidentally it is said that Mr. Gericke in 1885, found this new young concertmaster, Franz Kneisel, so young that he did not know how to smoke. Mr. Gericke patiently instructed him on the voyage to Boston, Mr. Kneisel acquiring a technique that lasted throughout his long and useful life!

And, in passing, I found an item new to me as to the Kneisel Quartet, formed during that first Gericke reign. That fine organizations deficits in its early seasons were met by the man who was meeting the larger ones of the parent organization, the orchestra!

—

Another note of the early years, of interest as one turns the excellent pages, is the reproduction of the program played February 17, 1883, in memory of Wagner's death four days previously—an all-Wagner program with the exception of the Weber "Oberon" scena and aria with a citation of Wagner's words at Weber's grave.

The program included the "Tristan" prelude, Lohengrin's "Legend and Farewell", the Siegfried Idyll, Elizabeth's "Dich teure Halle", the overture and Pogner's Address from "Meistersinger", the "Parsifal" prelude and the Death March from "Goetterdaemmerung"— a program that now might seem almost "popular" and that certainly would receive critical approval except from the modernists. But one criticism at the time gave voice to the thought that the program was "gloomy enough, in all conscience, and the necessity for its performance gave one more cause for regret at the composer's death. The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time"!

And on the note of anti-Wagnerism I must leave the book in today's column, having already overstayed my leave. But there's more to say—a lot more—about the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which I think will be of interest to readers of The Observation Post and which I shall endeavor, shortly, to say. For I feel that in talking of the great orchestra now fifty years old one may realize, in no small measure, the history of the development of musical appreciation not only in Boston but all over the United tSates. Because for more than forty years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has really been a national, rather than a strictly local, asset.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
MAY [illegible] 1931

"America is more appreciative of good music than any other country in the world today," states Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Thanks to that enthusiastic appreciation, America harbors the three most splendid orchestras I have ever heard."

And Dr. Koussevitzky names the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony, and continues:

"The greatest of these three is, to my mind, the Boston organization. I marvel more than ever at its sensitiveness, the ethereal quality of the wood-winds and the deep richness of the strings.

"But I very much doubt whether America, for all its superb musical institutions can yet be called a 'musical' nation. To be that, a country must produce a number of distinctive and, for want of a better word, 'nationalistic' composers. America has not yet done that.

"It seems to me that the American composer's development would be more rapid if conservatories of this country would invite more distinguished European professors of harmony, counterpoint and composition to these shores."

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

[illegible] great orchestra. That they succeeded [illegible] is in universal musical knowledge and in the testimony of this book.

A long appendix lists the entire personnel of the orchestra from the beginning, its whole répertoire, and all the soloists who have appeared in fifty years. They are by no means important of the documenence.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]AMESTOWN, N. Y.
[illegible]VE. JOURNAL
MAY 9 1931

[illegible]LEBRATED ORCHESTRA

[illegible]oston Symphony orchestra [illegible]tly commemorated its 50th

This organization has for [illegible]n considered one of the [illegible]reatest orchestras. It was [illegible] in 1881, largely thru the [illegible]nd efforts of Colonel Henry [illegible]son. Its first conductor was [illegible]ge Henschel, and amongst [illegible]brated leaders, it has been [illegible]y Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, [illegible]d Monteux. It is at pres[illegible]' the direction of a great [illegible]rge Koussevitzky.

[illegible]resting feature of the birth [illegible]ises was the return to the [illegible]'s desk of Henschel, who [illegible]years of age, is still vigor[illegible]h to cross the ocean from [illegible]to conduct the orchestra's [illegible]ram of 1881, with only one

[illegible]relate, not one of the orig[illegible]stra sat under his anniver[illegible]ction, altho two were able [illegible]sent at the concert.

[illegible]rge, as may be imagined, a tremendous ovation from concert devotees. The Bos[illegible]phony has done splendid the cause of music's ad[illegible]t in the United States.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
MAY 9 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HISTORY IS CITED

Fiftieth Season of Great Organization Brings Revised Book.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been an annual visitor to Richmond during the past several years, there will be undoubted interest in the new edition of M. A. DeWolfe's Howe's history of the orchestra just published. It is seventeen years since the history was first published, and the fiftieth season of this great orchestral organization has served as a fitting time to revise and republish it as a "Semi-centennial Edition," and it has been revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burke of the Symphony hall staff.

The period of this extension has been in many ways the most exciting in the history of the orchestra, covering, first, the war period, which all but destroyed the orchestra along with so much that was fine and aspiring in the art life of this country, and second, the famous strike which necessitated its complete reorganization. The early book narrated how Col. Higginson first made his signal venture, and how the orchestra gradually grew to fame.

Strengthened Orchestra.

A few months ago the first concert of the fiftieth season was heard in a new hall and by a vastly strengthened orchestra. The same program was played and the conductor, Sir George Henschel, at eighty, stood before the men where George Henschel, at thirty-one, had stood as conductor in 1881. Henry Higginson was then forty-seven years of age, and heard in that concert a realization of the dreams of youth and the provocation of dreams for the future, and the widespread influence that the orchestra should exert.

There is a chapter headed "Preliminary," which is to us one of the most ineresting of the book, because it gives emphasis to the attitude of Col. Higginson toward the study of music which might well find echo in the lives of many young men now preparing for a life of business.

In 1857, Charles Russell Lowell, travelling in Europe with Mr. Higginson, wrote to a mutual friend: "Henry is going to study music for three years . . . with immense good sense he sees that he will be far more of a man and no less of a merchant when he has duly cultivated the best gift nature gave him. It is the first good fruit of his coming abroad."

Later this young man wrote to his father: "When I came out here I had no plans, as you know. Trade was not satisfying to the inner life of man as a life-occupation. . . . If I find I am not profiting at all by my work I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it. You will ask, 'What is to come of it if successful?' I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty.

"I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. I am so much the stronger, the wider, the wiser, the better for my duties in life. . . . This I wish to be most clearly expressed and understood, should anyone ask about me. I am studying for my own good and pleasure . . . It is carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me."

Music As Profession.

An injury to his arm and ill-health as well as the necessity to make money, precluded the idea of music as a profession, and it was years later when, as a successful business man, he said to his family: "I can drop business now, retire and lead a life of comparative leisure; or I can continue to work and by my earnings establish an orchestra. This has been the dream of my life. I should like to do it if you agree with me."

Chapters are devoted to the beginnings under George Henschel, from 1881 to 1884; establishing under Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89; the service of Arthur Nickisch and Emil Paur, 1889-'98; the second term of Gericke, 1898-1906; Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fiedler and again Dr. Muck, 1906-1914; an interlude, which deals with the unhappy war period and the tragic arrest and deportation of Dr. Muck, dating from 1914 to 1918; the post-war Frenchmen, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, 1918-1924; new fires from Russia, Serge Koussevitsky, 1924.

It is a thrilling history and one which well repays the thoughtful reading of a non-musical public, as well as of those musicians who keep abreast with American musical history. It is by no means and essembly of dry statistics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 9 - 1931

Boston Symphony's Story Is Brilliantly Related by M. A. DeWolfe Howe

Famous Musical Organization and Its Unique Position in America Traced from Its Founding in 1881 by Higginson.

By PITTS SANBORN.

THIS is a period of biography, of a "New Biography" that psychoanalyzes its subjects and, wherever the material runs short, supplies the lack with ready fiction. It is a period of biographical epigrammatists, who select an angle of approach and never budge from it though truth be thrice a liar. It is a period of interpretations of an accepted set of facts which may turn out as antipodes as those pronounced in praise by Romain Rolland and in blame by Emil Ludwig upon Bettina von Arnim the friend of Goethe and of Beethoven. But at any rate the "new" biographers are never dull—at least superficially.

Before me is the biography not of a man but of an orchestra. I suppose it would be possible to "psyche" an orchestra, but it would not be easy. It is easier to probe the souls of the men who have made it. The orchestra, however, takes on with the years a life of its own, becomes a sentient, responsive entity. It is such a life that M. A. DeWolfe Howe recounts in the semicentennial edition of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Houghton Mifflin Co.), and he makes it as engrossing as any "new" biography in which the iniquities of Abraham Lincoln are vividly set forth or Lucretia Borgia is endowed with the chief attributes of sainthood.

* * *

Logical Subject For Such a Book.

THE Boston Symphony is the logical subject for such a book. It long held a unique position among American orchestras. Indeed, there were those who maintained that it was the finest orchestra in the world. The present century has witnessed the rise of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony, the New York Philharmonic (nearly forty years older than the Boston Orchestra, by the way) to dispute this primacy. Still the Boston remains, if no longer the admitted first, in any case second to none. Furthermore, during the greater part of its fifty years this orchestra was the personal property of one man, the late Henry Lee Higginson, who founded it in 1881 and cherished and sustained it until 1918.

Writing an "Account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" in October, 1911, Higginson explained the inception of his project:—"During some years of my youth, spent in Germany and especially in Austria, whither I went to study music, I conceived a hope to see an orchestra in Boston which should play as well as the great orchestras of Europe and give concerts at a reasonable price. . . . The end of the Civil War left me without an occupation or money and with a wife whom it was my first duty to support; so for many years my hope for music lay asleep. At last, in one or two years ending in 1880, luck had turned my way and enabled me to take up this project in earnest in 1881."

The result was, in words ascribed by Richard Aldrich to Higginson himself, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra became Higginson's yacht, his racing stable, his library, and his art gallery, or it took the place of what those things were to other men of wealth with other tastes. And so it continued until Higginson, then in his eighty-fifth year, laid down the burden of his own making during a peculiarly painful episode of the World War, to be succeeded by a committee of Bostonians headed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

* * *

Henschel First Conductor.

TO conduct the new orchestra Higginson chose a young musician of extraordinary gifts, though he lacked experience as a conductor namely, Georg Henschel, who, as Sir George Henschel, returned to conduct last October the program (with a single exception) of the first concert of all in 1881. Says Mr. Howe:—"What other conductor, one wondered, has ever lived to do just this?

"Through rehearsals, concerts, receptions, he moved, buoyant, keen, tireless, his beat as sure as his step was springy. Time, taking no ravage had but given this man a sharper musical zest, a broader understanding."

The inaugural program comprised Beethoven's overture "The Dedication of the House," an air from Gluck's "Orpheus," a symphony in E flat by Haydn (B. & H. No. 12), the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," a scena from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," and Weber's "Festival" overture. For the last item Henschel fifty years later substituted the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Soloists are no longer the fashion at Boston Symphony concerts, but in earlier days they helped lure the public. On the inaugural occasion that distinguished American contralto, Annie Louise Cary, sang the numbers by Gluck and by Bruch.

In 1884 Wilhelm Gericke of the Vienna Court Opera succeeded Henschel. Gericke was a man of valuable experience and a remarkable disciplinarian. After his second concert he remarked to Higginson:—"There are some musicians, but it is hardly an orchestra." So he set out to make it one, and when he relinquished it in 1889 he had succeeded in raising it to the first rank. It was commonly and deservedly said that "Gericke made our orchestra."

* * *

"Nothing Left for Me."

YET when Gericke reached Boston he was by no means prepared for what had already been done in the musical capital of America. The following illuminating anecdote was related by W. F. Apthorp, the eminent musical critic:—

"Shortly after Mr. Gericke's arrival in Boston, B. J. Lang asked him if he would not be interested to see the programs of past symphony concerts in our city; to which he replied he had already seen them all and studied them carefully. 'All' sounded rather startling; so Lang asked him how many seasons of programs he had seen. 'Oh, there have been about three,' answered Mr. Gericke.

"'Ah, I see,' said Lang, 'you mean the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but wouldn't you like to see the programs for the seventeen years of concerts given by the Harvard Musical Association, before the Symphony Orchestra existed?' Mr. Gericke's eyes opened wide at this, and he eagerly accepted the offer. So Lang gave him the two bound volumes of programs, which he returned in a few days, saying, 'I'm completely dumfounded! I do not see what is left for me to do here. You seem to have had everything already; more, much more, than we ever had in Vienna!'"

Gericke returned for the period from 1898 to 1906. During his absence Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur successively held sway. Nikisch, who was only 34 when he took up Gericke's baton, brought to the podium a new species of animal. He was America's first "prima donna of the baton." "It is credibly reported," Mr. Howe informs us, "that when Mr. Nikisch first heard the orchestra the technical beauty of its performance led him to exclaim:—'All I have to do is to poetize!' The results were inevitably telling." In fact, there was such a pouring of new wine into old bottles that Boston was profoundly stirred, and the public became as much exercised over the romantic and vigorous personality of the conductor as over the music that he directed.

* * *

Craze Abated in Time.

LITTLE dreaming what was eventually to happen on the rock-ribbed Island of Manhattan, a New York critic spoke of the "conductor cult" as a "phase of social activity which flourishes only in Boston." The regular morning salutation of Bostonians got to be, "Well, what do you think of Nikisch?" Eventually, however, the craze abated "and at the end of the season it was possible gently to criticise the new conductor without being stoned to death in Hamilton Place by infuriated buyers of season tickets." It seems that at the beginning of his first season in Boston Nikisch was much given to conducting without a score—a practice that some naive souls have supposed the invention of Arturo Toscanini.

The five years' reign of Emil Paur was altogether less notewor[thy]. Then Gericke came back for a second period of high distinction. [His] successor was Dr. Karl Muck, who occupied the podium from 1906 to [1912] and again from 1912 to 1918. Somebody whom Mr. Howe identifies as "an accurate observer" wrote:— "Mr. Gericke left the Symphony Orchestra a perfect instrument; Dr. Muck has given it a living [soul]."

Greeted as an old friend upon his return in 1912, Dr. Muck, conductor of splendid quality, presided over the orchestra with [great] success until he was arrested and interned during the World War. Mr. Howe's comment on that mysterious and distressing occurrence is interesting:—"The agitation against the conductor as a German bore fruit in his arrest by the federal government and his internment [here] as an alien enemy, though on grounds that were never made public. In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said to-day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was interned, [he] never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have [kept] behind him, or any reason why he should have been interned as an alien enemy.

* * *

Restored Orchestra's Prestige.

THE reorganization of the orchestra after German [influence] eliminated, the brief conductorship of the French [Pierné] and the longer one of another Frenchman, Pierre Monteux, to weather a smash-up of the personnel, are duly recorded. We are treated to an enthusiastic chapter on Serge Koussevitzky, Russian who came to the orchestra in 1924, restored the prestige of the public of other cities as well as of Boston.

"Now," Mr. Howe says, "it is not hard to perceive a tendency in this conductor who, being congenitally [inclined] to assumptions, has developed much in the succeeding years. He has burn no less brilliantly, but he has stabilized [himself] as an artist whom a London reviewer described as 'a man who goes through hedges backwards' in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. There have been whole festivals of Beethoven and Brahms in which [there] was no noticeable upsetting of academic decorum."

In an appendix is quoted the eloquent tribute to Higginson pronounced by Bliss Perry in the course of the orchestra's recent Bach festival in Symphony Hall, Boston. Other appendices furnish invaluable lists of the compositions played by the orchestra, the conductors and members of the orchestra, and the soloists who have appeared with it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAY 12 1931

for Your H

where he was staying he had seen two ladders, which could be lashed together. He borrowed a car and with the two ladders lashed to the side of it he returned to the big cactus in which he had discovered the lowest hole he had yet found. Cousin Tom came with him to help him raise the long ladder made by lashing the two together. It was just long enough and no more.

While Cousin Tom steadied it and Flip looked on, barking excitedly, Farmer Brown's Boy went up it until he could reach that hole. He thought it probably empty, but he meant to have the satisfaction of finding out. He had seen no bird in or near that hole since finding it, so he had no expectation of finding anything inside. He would, however, be able to find out what one was like inside and this was his real purpose.

It was all he could do to squeeze his hand through the opening. Once it was in he felt of the wall and was surprised to find how hard it was. Then he reached down to find out how deep it was. The tips of his fingers touched feathers, and then Farmer Brown's Boy let out a yell that caused Cousin Tom to grin.

"There must be someone at home," said he, and grinned again as Farmer Brown's Boy, forgetting where he was, clutched at the prickly cactus with his free hand as he tried to withdraw his other hand. This brought forth another yell, whereat Flip began to bark.

"Ouch!" cried Farmer Brown's Boy ruefully as he tried to withdraw his hand from that hole. "Someone at home is right, and that someone apparently doesn't intend to let me go."

"Steady there!" cried Cousin Tom. "If you dance about on that ladder much more you'll get into worse trouble than you are now. Have you got hold of whoever it is in there?"

"No. Whoever it is has got hold of me, and believe me, it hurts," replied Farmer Brown's Boy.

Cousin Tom unfeelingly chuckled. "Serves you right for intruding where you wasn't invited and wasn't wanted," said he.

The next story: "A Plucky Midget."

New Haven Woman Among Jobless Relief White House Callers

Washington, May 11.—(AP.)—A delegation of six women and five children called at the White House today to urge President Hoover to call a special session of Congress "to do something for the unemployed."

They were received by Walter Newton, one of the president's secretaries who said he would give their petition to the President.

Those who called were:

Mrs. Anna Coppola of New Haven, Conn., and her son, Michael. Mrs. Armita Johnson, of Cedar Grove, W. Va; Mrs. Pearl Shiflet and her boy Joseph, of Ward, West Va., Mrs. J. O.

Mr. Howe in his book traces the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in scholarly fashion through the years; in the first season of the orchestra there were twenty concerts and twenty public rehearsals under George Henschel, and all was not smooth sailing for the new orchestra or the new conductor, though both were popularly acclaimed. And, what seems very strange now, the proposals made to the players by Major Higginson for the second season, that they agree not to play under other conductors (except for the Handel-Haydn Society) and not to play dance music, were taken as a "stab at the older organizations and conductors" in Boston. In the second season the number of concerts and rehearsals for the public was raised to twenty-six—and it is interesting to note that during the orchestra's second season the old custom of a large sign giving the name of the piano used at the concert gave way to the dignified program note, despite very strong "trade" protests!

But when Mr. Henschel had gone

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
MAY 10

Book Tells of Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is 50 years old, exactly ten years older than the Chicago Symphony, and to commemorate its semi-centennial M. A. De Wolfe Howe has written a book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931" [Houghton-Mifflin]. Or, to speak more accurately, he has extended a book, for in August, 1914, he completed his first manuscript. The present volume takes up the narrative at that exciting date and brings it down to the present.

There is a lot of interesting and well told musical history in the book. In great part it centers around Henry Lee Higginson, for Maj. Higginson was responsible for the famous organization. He founded it, nursed it through babyhood, saw to its development and care, and for nearly forty years, until his death Nov. 14, 1919, exercised a strict but kindly paternal supervision, exactly as Louis Eckstein is doing for Ravinia now.

The orchestra has had a succession of conductors, at least two of them serving more than one term. Georg Henschel was the first, taking the baton for three seasons and, by a most interesting chain of circumstances, being able to return last season at the age of 80 to conduct again the very first program the orchestra ever played. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89 (there is a typographical error in the index of illustrations here); Arthur Nikisch, 1889-'93; Emil Paur, 1893-'98; Gericke again, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-'08; Max Fiedler, 1908-'12; Muck again, 1912-'18; Henri Rabaud, 1918-'19; Pierre Monteux, 1919-'24; and, finally, Serge Koussevitzky, who has wielded the baton up to the present time.

All these conductors made their impress upon the orchestra, and each one had his effect on making it what it is today. Not all were of the same merit, of course. But Mr. Howe, wisely feeling that the orchestra is far more important than any of its parts, gently glosses over certain conductorial shortcomings and then releases his eloquence over the musical virtues of Gericke, Nikisch, and Muck. Dr. Koussevitzky meets his approval: "The direct road to the glories of the past has been once more taken." For after the war the orchestra fell upon sad days. A series of unfortunate events nearly wrecked it, and years were necessary before scattered pieces could be put together again.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has always been composed in great part of importations from Europe, both players and conductors. In the beginning this course was necessary; it grew to be a habit. But Maj. Higginson and the board of trustees that picked up the reins after he laid them down were always preoccupied with the problem of putting together a great orchestra. That they succeeded is in universal musical knowledge and in the testimony of this book.

A long appendix lists the entire personnel of the orchestra from the beginning, its whole repertoire, and all the soloists who have appeared in fifty years. They are by no means the least important of the documentary evidence.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL
MAY 9 1931

A CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra has recently commemorated its 50th birthday. This organization has for years been considered one of the world's greatest orchestras. It was organized in 1881, largely thru the interest and efforts of Colonel Henry L. Higginson. Its first conductor was Sir George Henschel, and amongst other celebrated leaders, it has been directed by Gericke, Nikisch, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux. It is at present under the direction of a great leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

An interesting feature of the birthday exercises was the return to the conductor's desk of Henschel, who altho 80 years of age, is still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England to conduct the orchestra's first program of 1881, with only one change.

Sad to relate, not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction, altho two were able to be present at the concert.

Sir George, as may be imagined, received a tremendous ovation from Boston's concert devotees. The Boston Symphony has done splendid work in the cause of music's advancement in the United States.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
MAY 9 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HISTORY IS CITED

Fiftieth Season of Great Organization Brings Revised Book.

By HELEN de MOTTE.

Because the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been an annual visitor to Richmond during the past several years, there will be undoubted interest in the new edition of M. A. DeWolfe's Howe's history of the orchestra just published. It is seventeen years since the history was first published, and the fiftieth season of this great orchestral organization has served as a fitting time to revise and republish it as a "Semi-centennial Edition," and it has been revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burke of the Symphony hall staff.

The period of this extension has been in many ways the most exciting in the history of the orchestra, covering, first, the war period, which all but destroyed the orchestra along with so much that was fine and aspiring in the art life of this country, and second, the famous strike which necessitated its complete reorganization. The early book narrated how Col. Higginson first made his signal venture, and how the orchestra gradually grew to fame.

Strengthened Orchestra.

A few months ago the first concert of the fiftieth season was heard in a new hall and by a vastly strengthened orchestra. The same program was played and the conductor, Sir George Henschel, at eighty, stood before the men where George Henschel, at thirty-one, had stood as conductor in 1881. Henry Higginson was then forty-seven years of age, and heard in that concert a realization of the dreams of youth and the provocation of dreams for the future, and the widespread influence that the orchestra should exert.

There is a chapter headed "Preliminary," which is to us one of the most ineresting of the book, because it gives emphasis to the attitude of Col. Higginson toward the study of music which might well find echo in the lives of many young men now preparing for a life of business.

In 1857, Charles Russell Lowell, travelling in Europe with Mr. Higginson, wrote to a mutual friend: "Henry is going to study music for three years . . . with immense good sense he sees that he will be far more of a man and no less of a merchant when he has duly cultivated the best gift nature gave him. It is the first good fruit of his coming abroad."

Later this young man wrote to his father: "When I came out here I had no plans, as you know. Trade was not satisfying to the inner life of man as a life-occupation. . . . If I find I am not profiting at all by my work I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it. You will ask, 'What is to come of it if successful?' I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty.

"I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. I am so much the stronger, the wider, the wiser, the better for my duties in life. . . . This I wish to be most clearly expressed and understood, should anyone ask about me. I am studying for my own good and pleasure . . . It is carrying out your own darling idea of making an imperishable capital in education. My money may fly away; my knowledge cannot. One belongs to the world, the other to me."

Music As Profession.

An injury to his arm and ill-health as well as the necessity to make money, precluded the idea of music as a profession, and it was years later when, as a successful business man, he said to his family: "I can drop business now, retire and lead a life of comparative leisure; or I can continue to work and by my earnings establish an orchestra. This has been the dream of my life. I should like to do it if you agree with me."

Chapters are devoted to the beginnings under George Henschel, from 1881 to 1884; establishing under Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-'89; the service of Arthur Nickisch and Emil Paur, 1889-'98; the second term of Gericke, 1898-1906; Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fiedler and again Dr. Muck, 1906-1914; an interlude, which deals with the unhappy war period and the tragic arrest and deportation of Dr. Muck, dating from 1914 to 1918; the post-war Frenchmen, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, 1918-1924; new fires from Russia, Serge Koussevitsky, 1924.

It is a thrilling history and one which well repays the thoughtful reading of a non-musical public, as well as of those musicians who keep abreast with American musical history. It is by no means and assembly of dry statistics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
MAY 9 - 1931

'Pictures at an Exhibition' Now on Record List

In view of its recent performance by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra under Eugene Goossens, the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition,' transcribed by Ravel (Victor, M-102) should find many eager and appreciative hearers in this city.

There are no faults to find in this recording, for it is a perfect combination of fine orchestra, great conductor and incomparable reproduction. It is played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky who, it will be remembered, gave the work its first orchestral performance in this country—and it represents what is perhaps the best work this superlative group and equally superlative conductor has done for the phonograph.

The composition, written originally as a suite for piano, is a series of tonal descriptions of various watercolors and drawings by Victor Hartmann, a friend of the composer, that were exhibited in the Academy of Fine Arts, St. Petersburg, in 1874. The music interprets the scenes and incidents

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
1931

The World of Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Lived Gloriously for a Half Century.

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE Boston Symphony orchestra spent most of last winter celebrating its fiftieth anniversary. Stravinsky, of course, led the procession with his symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization.

One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. The work is not entirely new; but this edition has been revised and brought up to date. It is naturally a vital contribution to the musical history of this country. Its pages teem with interesting matter about the distinguished founder of the orchestra and the various conductors who have presided over its artistic activities. Not the least sympathetic portion is that dealing with the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henschel after 50 years.

Henschel was the first wielder of its baton and it was a happy fortune that at 80 years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, making but one change in it. Not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present.

* * *

There is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Col. Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Col. Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music.

Col Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. That he was not always fortunate cannot be denied. Mr. Howe has been lenient in his treatment of some of the conductors, undoubtedly because he recognized the fact that not one of them was without some individual merit, but there were certain generals of the little army who were almost in the rough rider class.

* * *

Mr. Howe has placed the musical world under a debt of gratitude by bringing his work up to date. Boston has always held a peculiarly influential position in the center of musical activities in this country. The city is not now and never was an operatic community. Boston's musical culture has radiated from the symphony concerts and has enjoyed the benefit of a sound basis. There has been very little scope for sensationalism, even if there had been a desire for it. The orchestra is Boston's own splendid virtuoso and upon the beauty and eloquence of its playing the city depends for its most intense musical enjoyment.

There were concerts last winter in which the orchestra rose to thrilling power, to a magnificence of tone impossible to surpass, and to a certainty and finish of technic arousing the admiration of every hearer. That we had to listen to some feeble compositions was due to the conductor's general invitation to the most prominent composers to contribute items to the anniversary. Mr. Koussevitzy got the best that was procurable, and should not be blamed because some of it was hardly worth while.

The Bostonians will next season begin their second half century. May they be as successful at its conclusion as they are now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAY 13 1931

The Boston Way

The city of Boston will always be itself and it does not care who knows it. There are still echoes of the recent event when the Prince and Princess of Japan were forced to sit in the second balcony at a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because regular subscribers to the Friday afternoon concert could not be expected to give up their seats downstairs. Indeed, it would have been almost lese majeste to suggest it, for the Friday afternoon concert is much like a ritual with some people.

Long ago some wise cracker said that the total equipment of a Boston woman was a Boston bag, an account at Hovey's, a symphony ticket and a moral purpose. Well, Boston bags have gone out of style—in other places at least—and they have been disappearing from Boston. Other big stores have competed with Hovey's so that even the born and bred Boston woman may have accounts in other shops. But the moral purpose and the symphony ticket remain. Of course it is the women folk who mainly go to the Friday afternoon concerts, for even Boston men must go to business and there are few positions, executive or more humble, that permit a man to go to afternoon concerts. So it may be the women rather than the other sex that has surrounded the Friday afternoon symphony with the ritualistic atmosphere.

It is said that the Prince and Princess of Japan did not mind the second balcony at all. They seemed to realize that "it happened in Boston," and was not meant for any disrespect to royalty. As the New York Herald Tribune so aptly says, "If Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of the symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE
MAY 16 1931

Music No

Edward Weiss to Join Fillion —Jeanne Brideson Violinist —String Ensemble—A Two-Piano Recital—New Organ Compositions—Ray McClintock Sings—Boston Symphony History — Rebecca Davidson Coming.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Would you know the history of the Boston Symphony? Well, here it is and published by Houghton Mifflin Company, and an impressive history it is.

M. A. DeWolfe Howe wrote the book and it is the work of an editor, a compiler and not the product of a music critic—thank what Boston Brahmins may be. The book was prepared for the semi-centennial celebration and is a worthy tribute to that outstanding orchestra.

Here one finds Colonel Henry Higginson and the early days, his great dream and its ultimate consummation. Each epoch is fully covered, ranging from those early days under Georg Henschel, and then Wilhelm Gericke, and on down to Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, and then Dr. Karl Muck, and a shift to France and Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux and finally Serge Koussevitzky.

A huge appendix gives the repertoire (a most formidable one) and then follows the personnel, and finally a catalogue of the many soloists.

It is a creditable volume to a really noble organization, and the book is to be commended to those interested in the history of American music, and particularly native orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 17 1931

THE PARIS SEASON IN FULL SWING

Many Famous Conductors and Orchestras—Alberic Magnard's "Guercoeur" Completed by Guy Ropartz—Berlin String Quartet

By HENRY PRUNIERES.

PARIS, May 6, 1931.

THE "Grand Season" has begun and promises to be much more interesting than one might have expected in a period of crises like the present, and after the disastrous concert season which we have had up to now. Great foreign orchestras are succeeding one another: first, Mengelberg and the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam, then Furtwängler and the Philharmonic of Berlin, Bruno Walter and the Leipzig Gewandhaus, and others. Unfortunately, we shall not have had the pleasure of hearing one of the great American orchestral organizations.

It was Felix Weingartner who, so to speak, pressed the button and ignited the spark. The regrettable incidents which prevented his coming here during March simply had the effect of augmenting the publicity already made about his name, one of the most celebrated and loved names in Paris before the war.

The crowd which thronged the Salle Pleyel acclaimed his entrance. After the first work was played through, however, it was necessary to confess that the two concerts finished more frigidly than they had begun. To be just, however, it must be pointed out that the Pasdeloup Orchestra showed itself to be a rather mediocre organization, and evidently had not had sufficient rehearsals.

Nevertheless, occasions in Paris where the auditor heard an orchestra play with such discipline and attention to nuances have been comparatively rare. In recent times we have listened to conductors such as Toscanini, Furtwängler, Mengelberg, Koussevitzky, Stokowski, Bruno Walter and Pierre Monteux. Herr Weingartner has hardly had any opportunity to conduct either in Austria or Germany, and has been forced to content himself with the orchestra in Basle. There is no doubt that he was at his best in interpreting Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. One can feel that he loves this composer's music deeply.

At the Opéra we heard Albéric Magnard's "Guercoeur." This composer strikes us as a strange figure. Wealthy, son of a famous Parisian journalist, he withdrew himself from the world at large, professed somewhat advanced points of view, and lived with his family in a charming country estate north of Paris.

* * *

He had his works printed at his own expense. To buy them, it was necessary to send him a personal letter. He would send his music only if the tone of the epistles pleased him. This "original" had studied composition under Vincent d'Indy and had professed the cult of Wagner and of the classics. A man of great and diversified culture and of lofty moral heights, he was as uncompromising, inflexible and unswerving as steel in what he considered to be his duty.

I knew him well enough to guard his remembrance as that of a zealous and great soul. He refused to leave his villa when the German invasion was taking place and sent his wife and daughters to Paris. When the soldiers invaded the village and began to pillage and batter down the garden gate, he shot two uhlans with his revolver and perished in the flames of his home, which had been fired, amid all his manuscripts.

By means of the composer's notes and the second act of his opera "Guercoeur," which alone had been recovered, his friend Guy Ropartz has reconstructed the orchestration. The work dates thirty years back and is written in the Wagnerian idiom, but its spirited moods, its poesy and its emotional powers evoke admiration and overshadow the weaknesses of the libretto.

The first and third acts take place in heaven and are not particularly dramatic. They are, properly speaking, rather scenes in an oratorio where the choruses are the principals. Guercoeur cannot content himself with celestial bliss. Torn from the intoxication of battle the day following a victory which has made it possible for him to guide his people to conquest and liberty, he wishes to live once more as a mortal. He dreams of finding again his wife Giselle, his disciple Heurtal, and the people he loves. Truth grants him his prayer and sends him back to earth.

* * *

In the second act Guercoeur, led on by a host of illusions, finds that Giselle is unfaithful to his memory and that his inconstant people have chosen his own disciple Heurtal as their dictator. Thereupon, Guercoeur perishes in the rebellion which follows in the wake of Heurtal's triumph. Back in heaven, he is welcomed in the third act by Truth, Kindness, Beauty and Suffering, who lull and console his bleeding soul and confer supreme peace upon him.

The poem, which the composer had written himself, is not without its clumsy and tedious moments. The music, however, breathes genuine nobility. The entire second act has a feverish power and an intensity of essence which stand out in great contrast to the Elysian chorus of the prologue. There are indeed moments when the grandiloquence of this music is fatiguing and doubtless out of date, but it contains some pages, nevertheless, which will hold their own against changing fashions in art.

* * *

It must be conceded that the work has been well produced. Of course, certain details of the stage mounting might be criticized: the foggy atmosphere which unrolls itself in the scene in Paradise, which really demanded radiant luminosity instead; the scenery of the first scene in the second act, with its zinc trees and its screaming green lawns, and the grove, in the third scene of the second act, which was in the way of the manoeuvres of the combatants. All in all, matters were successful from this point of view, and the interpretation was of the highest quality.

A pupil of Jean de Reszké, a young American baritone, Mr. Endrèze, did unusually good work in the difficult rôle of Guercoeur. He has the best voice which has been heard for some years on the Opéra boards. His voice has, in reality, the characteristic timbre of a tenor and he is able to reach both the upper and lower extremes with ease. The power of his voice is unusual. He is, moreover, an artist who is full of intelligence and one who has proved himself to be an excellent actor. His success was great.

Others in the cast who were warmly received were M. Forti, who possesses a very good tenor voice, and Mlle. Marise Ferrer, who sang the soprano rôle of Giselle with a superb dramatic intensity. We certainly have no better singers at the Opéra today, and it is a long time since we have heard so perfect a balance in casting. I was about to forget Yvonne Gall, Hoerner, Morère and Lapeyrette, who succeeded in holding the attention of the public in the dull scenes during the first and third acts. M. Ruhlmann conducted with much warmth and energy.

Richard Tauber, the German tenor, appeared a few days ago at the Salle Pleyel and was warmly received. He was first heard in the film "La Marche à la Gloire," and then he appeared personally and sang two classic airs by Méhul and Mozart and some airs from Lehar's operettas.

* * *

It is gratuitous to praise the qualities of this voice and its wonderful ease of production. He has been compared to Caruso. The Italian, however, had a better style, and in hearing Tauber sing Don Ottavio's air from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," the remembrance of Caruso singing the same air with a wholly different sort of mastery came back to me. Caruso, it will be recalled, sang in Italian, and this air loses much in a German translation. In the operetta airs Tauber was supreme. The audience gave him a seemingly endless ovation.

The New Berlin String Quartet, one of the best organizations of its kind, has just been heard here. It plays superbly and may be put in the same rank as the Kölisch Quartet of Vienna. Like the Viennese group, it does not fear to play with rich sonority. This is a change from the prewar quartets in Germany, which used to play with a peculiarly unpleasant sort of tone.

The visiting ensemble played Wolfgang Fortner's quartet for us at one of the concerts of La Revue Musicale.

We must remember this name. It belongs to a musician of distinct worth. His quartet is a strong and original work and made a deep impression upon the critics and musicians who were present at this audition.

At the Straram concerts a "Sérénade" by the Czech composer Bohuslav Martinú was warmly received. This work for orchestra proved to be ingenious, fanciful and charming. It is genuine music which gushes out naturally despite its complexity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

instrumental in uncovering one of the most dangerous conspiracies of the war. Perhaps there was good reason for interning Dr. Muck.

K. B. K.

Saybrook, May 19, 1931.

THI
SAN CI

Wider Being Phonog

Phonograph sounder and artistic work this season h tion. Rome of records. paper, Can award of a amounting six best rec France.
Current r country con tention of noisseurs of A colorfu sides) inc brilliant or sorgsky pia Exhibition. compositio zarre and gains ren to symph formers ar
Orchestra and Koussevitzky. The eighth side of the set is occupied with a Debussy
"Sarabande" in orchestral transcription of Ravel.
Columbia serves the interests of pianists presentation (four sides discs) of the F

th ST., NEW YORK
Chelsea 8860

CLIPPING FROM KSON, TENN.
SUN
Y 18 1931

luctor of the Boston Symphony vas presented a clock by sub-
Was this a subtle hint to keep
?

Conductor's Job

Personal He Must Be, If He Is to Do It Well

"HAT which is called "tradition" may really be only present custom, and score-indications are equally unreliable. Surely what is truly significant in any interpretation comes, not primarily from mere fidelity to custom or to the bald letter of the score, but rather from something in the interpreter's imagination, his emotions, his musician's nature, which the composer awakens. Unless one can experience an emotion not his own (which is doubtful psychology), the process can be nothing else than personal. If there are two sorts of conductors, they are surely those who wave through a score, scrupulously but with a dim emotional comprehension (we all know those dull performances), and those who divine the composer's feelings through the inevitable channel of their own. [J. N. Burk in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931"

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
MAY 9 - 1931

'Pictures at an Exhibition' Now on Record List

In view of its recent performance by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra under Eugene Goossens, the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition,' transcribed by Ravel (Victor, M-102) should find many eager and appreciative hearers in this city.

There are no faults to find in this recording, for it is a perfect combination of fine orchestra, great conductor and incomparable reproduction. It is played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky—who, it will be remembered, gave the work its first orchestral performance in this country—and it represents what is perhaps the best work this superlative group and equally superlative conductor has done for the phonograph.

The composition, written originally as a suite for piano, is a series of tonal descriptions of various watercolors and drawings by Victor Hartmann, a friend of the composer, that were exhibited in the Academy of Fine Arts, St. Petersburg, in 1874. The music interprets the scenes and incidents pictured, ranging through moods of sombreness, gayety and satire.

The playing is now brilliant, again subtle and poetic to a degree, and it has all the skill and finesse characteristic of Koussevitzky's leadership. In all ways, this is a unique recording and should be a part of every conscientious music lover's library.

Organ Fugue in G Minor (Bach) and The White Peacock (Griffes), played by Olga Samaroff, pianist .(Victor, 7384).

The Bach selection is sturdily done, with fine authority and impressive keyboard skill. In antipodal contrast is the Griffes composition, which has all the wit and sly characterization that Griffes put into it. An interesting coupling, whose artistry and realistic piano tone make it a highly desirable addition to record collections.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAY 13 1931

The Boston Way

The city of Boston will always be itself and it does not care who knows it. There are still echoes of the recent event when the Prince and Princess of Japan were forced to sit in the second balcony at a regular Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because regular subscribers to the Friday afternoon concert could not be expected to give up their seats downstairs. Indeed, it would have been almost lese majeste to suggest it, for the Friday afternoon concert is much like a ritual with some people.

Long ago some wise cracker said that the total equipment of a Boston woman was a Boston bag, an account at Hovey's, a symphony ticket and a moral purpose. Well, Boston bags have gone out of style—in other places at least—and they have been disappearing from Boston. Other big stores have competed with Hovey's so that even the born and bred Boston woman may have accounts in other shops. But the moral purpose and the symphony ticket remain. Of course it is the women folk who mainly go to the Friday afternoon concerts, for even Boston men must go to business and there are few positions, executive or more humble, that permit a man to go to afternoon concerts. So it may be the women rather than the other sex that has surrounded the Friday afternoon symphony with the ritualistic atmosphere.

It is said that the Prince and Princess of Japan did not mind the second balcony at all. They seemed to realize that "it happened in Boston," and was not meant for any disrespect to royalty. As the New York Herald Tribune so aptly says, "If Judgment Day itself should fall on a Friday in the season, it is probable that the Angel Gabriel would be roundly shushed by good Bostonians for introducing a discord into the regular performance of the symphony."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 17 1931

THE PARIS S

Many Famous Conduc "Guercoeur" Complete

By HENRY PRUNIERES.

PARIS, May 6, 1931.

THE "Grand Season" has begun and promises to be much more interesting than one might have expected in a period of crises like the present, and after the disastrous concert season which we have had up to now. Great foreign orchestras are succeeding one another: first, Mengelberg and the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam, then Furtwängler and the Philharmonic of Berlin, Bruno Walter and the Leipzig Gewandhaus, and others. Unfortunately, we shall not have had the pleasure of hearing one of the great American orchestral organizations.

It was Felix Weingartner who, so to speak, pressed the button and ignited the spark. The regrettable incidents which prevented his coming here during March simply had the effect of augmenting the publicity already made about his name, one of the most celebrated and loved names in Paris before the war.

The crowd which thronged the Salle Pleyel acclaimed his entrance. After the first work was played through, however, it was necessary to confess that the two concerts finished more frigidly than they had

FEW names can claim the s ter celebrity that has made the Borgias the incarnation one of the blackest periods
Italian history. Rodrigo Borgi who ruled as Pope Alexander from 1492 to 1503, his son Cesare ar his daughter Lucrezia are remem bered, and to some extent justly, expert practitioners of most of th crimes and vices of which human n ture is capable.

Recently new light has been she on this remarkable family by th discovery and publication of forty four letters which had hitherto la unnoticed in the secret archives the Vatican. These letters, fall between the dates of Novemb
1493, and December, 1494, show
Borgias in a rather more engag aspect than do most of the histor accounts. The reason is that th worst crimes, as we know of the were committed after 1494. In t year Lucrezia was only 14 years with her reputation as a poiso still to earn; Cesare was 18, a Alexander, at the age of 63, was s administering his high position w a certain amount of dignity and fectiveness.

Alexander's past, however, had n been all it might have been. Luc zia and Cesare were the children his former mistress, Vannozza
Cattaneis, and by 1493 he had ca
Vannozza off and had taken in h place Giulia Farnese, wife of Orsi Orsini and reputed to be the mo beautiful woman in Italy. But the is no doubt that he was fond Cesare as well as afraid of him, an
... years reveal a very deep a

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
22

DR. MUCK'S CASE

A Reader Asserts His Internment Was Warranted

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Reading your editorial concerning our Government's treatment of Dr. Muck, with its suggestion that this was one of the things for which we may now "blush with shame," I wondered how much you really knew of the matter which you criticized so sharply. The following story may have some bearing on it. Probably we will never know, but it looks so. The friend who told it to me heard it from an intimate friend of the young lady who acted as detective in the matter.

This lady, an American, was a teacher in a Boston school and making a specialty of the German language, and she went one afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony, Dr. Muck conducting. After the concert began she noticed that two women sitting directly back of her were conversing in German, but the music held her attention, and she caught only a word now and then. Gradually it dawned upon her that they were not making sentences, but using only detached words, in other words using a code, at least in part. Then she listened intently and caught names and words that suggested very serious things. Very soon they left the concert hall, and after a moment she followed them, taking the same street car with them, getting off at the same place, and saw them enter a house close to that corner.

She was too troubled to sleep that night, went again to the corner where they had left the car and stood there wondering what she ought to do about it, for it was evident that the women had not gone to the concert to hear the music, but to give information to some third person either sitting near them or, perhaps, communicating with someone on the concert stage by lip reading. Certainly there was no reason for using code between themselves when they remained together after going out.

As the young lady stood there on the corner, one of the women came out of the house and boarded a street car, and the girl also took the car. Whether the other woman was already on the car or entered soon after unobserved, she could not tell, but presently the first woman rose to leave and passing along the aisle dropped a tiny folded paper into the lap of the other woman.

It was a question whether to follow the first or remain and watch the second woman, but the girl remained and followed her when she left the car and entered one of the old Boston hotels. The woman who had left the car first was already there, and the two women went at once to the elevator. So did the girl, who got off at the same floor and secured the number of the room which they entered. Then she went to the telephone and called up the secret service and told them she believed she had valuable and serious information for them. She was told to remain in the hotel lobby, and a man would be sent to her, whom she might recognize by a certain flower in his lapel. Presently he came, greeted her rather effusively, as if they were friends and apologizing for his delay in keeping their appointment, quietly leading her to a side room where they could talk unobserved. He questioned her closely, then thanked her and said that was all and that she was then free to go.

Very soon after that Dr. Muck was arrested. For a long time she heard nothing more of the matter, and I think it was not till after the close of the war that she received a letter from the Government thanking her warmly for the good work she had done and saying she had been instrumental in uncovering one of the most dangerous conspiracies of the war. Perhaps there was good reason for interning Dr. Muck.

K. B. K.

Saybrook, May 19, 1931.

The old hand-pumped pipe organ has almost disappeared, but a few of the men who pumped it are left. The following article tells something of the spirit of their oc-

Guild, With Some Famous Members, Was Formed To Preserve Relics and Memories of the Calling

PIPE-ORGAN PUMPERS CHERISH TRADITIONS wrote: "You have really given us four or five days of pain and full of the Bravest anxiety, on account of the bad and terrible news which has which they were received, despite a heavy downpour of rain.

The apparent affection between

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE
MAY 16 1931

Music No

Edward Weiss to Join Fillion —Jeanne Brideson Violinist —String Ensemble—A Two-Piano Recital—New Organ Compositions—Ray McClintock Sings—Boston Symphony History — Rebecca Davidson Coming.

By HARVEY GAUL.

one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present.

* * *

There is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Col. Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Col. Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music.

Col Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. That he was not always fortunate cannot be denied. Mr. Howe has been lenient in his treatment of some of the conductors, undoubtedly because he recognized the fact that not one of them was without some individual merit, but there were certain generals of the little army who were almost in the rough rider class.

* * *

Mr. Howe has placed the musical world under a debt of gratitude by bringing his work up to date. Boston has always held a peculiarly influential position in the center of musical activities in this country. The city is not now and never was an operatic community. Boston's musical culture has radiated from the symphony concerts and has enjoyed the benefit of a sound basis. There has been very little scope for sensationalism, even if there had been a desire for it. The orchestra is Boston's own splendid virtuoso and upon the beauty and eloquence of its playing the city depends for its most intense musical enjoyment.

There were concerts last winter in which the orchestra rose to thrilling power, to a magnificence of tone impossible to surpass, and to a certainty and finish of technic arousing the admiration of every hearer. That we had to listen to some feeble compositions was due to the conductor's general invitation to the most prominent composers to contribute items to the anniversary. Mr. Koussevitzy got the best that was procurable, and should not be blamed because some of it was hardly worth while.

The Bostonians will next season begin their second half century. May they be as successful at its conclusion as they are now.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Would you know the history of the Boston Symphony? Well, here it is and published by Houghton Mifflin Company, and an impressive history it is.

M. A. DeWolfe Howe wrote the book and it is the work of an editor, a compiler and not the product of a music critic—thank what Boston Brahmins may be. The book was prepared for the semi-centennial celebration and is a worthy tribute to that outstanding orchestra.

Here one finds Colonel Henry Higginson and the early days, his great dream and its ultimate consummation. Each epoch is fully covered, ranging from those early days under Georg Henschel, and then Wilhelm Gericke, and on down to Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, and then Dr. Karl Muck, and a shift to France and Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux and finally Serge Koussevitzky.

A huge appendix gives the repertoire (a most formidable one) and then follows the personnel, and finally a catalogue of the many soloists.

It is a creditable volume to a really noble organization, and the book is to be commended to those interested in the history of American music, and particularly native orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAY 17 1931

Wider Appreciation Being Accorded Phonograph Music

Phonograph music is acquiring sounder and sounder prestige in the artistic world. German collectors this season held a national convention. Rome is establishing a library of records. A Paris weekly newspaper, Candide, announces the award of a "Grand Prix du Disque," amounting to 25,000 francs, for the six best records issued each year in France.

Current releases of records in this country continue to merit the attention of the most fastidious connoisseurs of music.

A colorful album (Victor, eight sides) includes Maurice Ravel's brilliant orchestration of the Mussorgsky piano suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." In many passages the composition, fascinating in its bizarre and mysterious inspiration, gains remarkably by transference to symphonic medium. The performers are the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor Serge Koussevitzky. The eighth side of the set is occupied with a Debussy "Sarabande" in orchestral transcription of Ravel.

Columbia serves the interests of pianists [illegible] presentation (four sides discs) of the F

THE ORIGINAL HENRY ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
MAY 18 1931

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was presented a clock by subscribers. Was this a subtle hint to keep better time?

Conductor's Job

Personal He Must Be, If He Is to Do It Well

"THAT which is called "tradition" may really be only present custom, and score-indications are equally unreliable. Surely what is truly significant in any interpretation comes, not primarily from mere fidelity to custom or to the bald letter of the score, but rather from something in the interpreter's imagination, his emotions, his musician's nature, which the composer awakens. Unless one can experience an emotion not his own (which is doubtful psychology), the process can be nothing else than personal. If there are two sorts of conductors, they are surely those who wave through a score, scrupulously but with a dim emotional comprehension (we all know those dull performances), and those who divine the composer's feelings through the inevitable channel of their own. [J. N. Burk in "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931"

Spring Rites For a Season Now Closing

Leave-Taking, Music and Other Incidents Bestrewing the Symphonic Friday

THE CONCERT itself shall be example and excuse for the reviewer. Perhaps it was the return of spring weather which made some of us see all things green and count spats a useless and deplorable human invention. Perhaps it was the thirty pages of tables, lists, summaries, indices, that filled more than half the program-book—the annual orgy, on such a May Day more than usually indecent. Perhaps it was the chronological record—the final matinée of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Whatever the cause, the occasion wore a relaxed air—the indomitable Koussevitzky and his equally indomitable orchestra always excepted. They persevered to the end. For the rest of us the present seemed more engaging than the past in spite of the editor's monstrosity of statistics; the future, in turn, more beguiling than the present.

True, we listened not only politely but intently. True again, the last matinée audience of the symphonic year was altogether coughless. Yet were our minds as firm-fixed as our ears upon music and performance? There was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," for instance, with which the concert began. It had not changed as masterful piece of flowing counterpoint. But it was pleasanter to think of the banks of the Rhine—the river flowing between—when the train skirts them en route to Munich, most agreeable of summer cities. Soon Debussy's Faun was peering, tonally, out of his bosky shelter. By the same token, soon the chestnut-trees will be in bloom in Paris and the Seine slip under the bridges gold-sheeted from the westering sun.

Between whiles, too, our tongues would run away from the music in presence. Since familiar numbers, all in high favor, filled the program, there was no one to say "Well, Penstock, I suppose you liked that awful stuff," as they do after new Hindemith or new Honegger. At this late day no seat-mates protest their devotion to Beethoven's Fifth—possibly from the subconscious suspicion that at the back of both their heads is a suppressed desire to flee that hackneyed masterpiece. Much more in tune with the day and the mood were exchanges of spring leave-takings and summer plans, diversified by swift little excursions into the Subscription Office to discover whether next year's seats were certainly booked. For on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor—will begin.

Perhaps the relaxing mood seeped also into the applause; while in such things, as every frequenter of Symphony Hall knows, the matinée audience is law and custom unto itself. At the first pause in Beethoven in C minor, it began to dribble away. Not even a bit of ceremony for the five-months' parting with conductor and orchestra could stay it, when at last Beethoven was weary of repeating his final chords. It summoned the orchestra to its feet; called back the conductor once and twice; clapped out and stamped out farewell. But its collective mind, as usual, was on the door and the car, the taxi and the traffic. Nor, as usual, could it agree to stand unanimously or to sit collectively when it was clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's first entrance. For the standing posture, some will and some will not, whether a passing Japanese Prince or a familiar conductor is the occasion. Whoever the object, there should be an end to these scraggly matinée "homages."

In point of fact the only flood of applause, the afternoon through, followed the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Then it was torrential, alike for the splendor of the music and the passion of the performance. So eager and persistent were these plaudits that they hastened the rites of the day. In the first twenty-minutes of the concert, the orchestra was on its feet, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin at handshaking; while from the back of the stage to the back of the auditorium everybody was beaming upon everyone else. A bright May afternoon does not invite to amateur program-making. Yet the Prelude might have been better placed at the end of the concert. In itself it is an irresistible music. The performance yesterday drove forward, sonorous and striding, tense and climactic, at moments overmuch so for Wagner's flood of golden tone and the songful waves into which it often breaks. The Prelude not only suits a festal occasion: it teems with the zest of living and doing and pleasuring. At the sound of it romance cries in the street and purges our souls, though we may be as heavy with the years and the flesh and our natural vanities as those self-same burghers of Nuremberg. Some of us breathe the freer; hold our heads the higher, for the hearing of it. It signalled the beginning, it should have crowned the end, of this semi-centennial year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to be noted and at leisure pondered. To scan the "rush seats" in the second balcony was to note a few unoccupied. What say to that with a program of familiar classics—"Die Meistersinger" and "The Faun," "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist list will usually fill every chair? And what again for the scant applause after Debussy's Prelude? It is an acknowledged and untarnished masterpiece. Conductor and orchestra evoke and excel in it. Seldom have they been more in the mood and the atmosphere than when Mr. Laurent sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his oboe, Mr. Pinchek his clarinet, Mr. Zighera his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his companions their horns. Yet the reward was thin

1931

NO REASON TO PUNISH KARL MUCK

Grounds for Interning Conductor Never Made Public

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Simultaneously with the closing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season there has come from the press of the Houghton Mifflin Company a new edition of M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the orchestra, first published in 1914, that carries the chronicle of that illustrous band straight up to the final programmes. Mr. Howe's collaborator in this deed of efficiency was John N. Burk of the staff of Symphony Hall, to whom is due the ninth and tenth chapters, that cover the conductorships of Rabaud of Monteux and that of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; while from Mr. Howe himself comes Chapter VIII, captioned Interlude, that deals with the trying years of 1914-18.

EFFECT OF THE WAR

The progress of the orchestra from its inception through the spring of 1914 was untroubled, save for minor disputations. Twice in the ensuing years its very existence was threatened. First, by the World war and its obvious effect upon an orchestra that from the beginning had been German trained and German led and, second, by the strike of 1920, when the defection of 36 musicians, a third of the entire personnel, precipitated an even more serious crisis.

In the prosperity, good feeling and general satisfactions of this anniversary year those dark and troublous days are easily forgotten. To read Mr. Howe's and Mr. Burk's pages is to have them vividly recalled and also to be grateful to those who safely piloted the band over such stormy seas.

Starts in Providence

When the orchestra entered upon the season of 1917-18 the feeling engendered by the war was growing in intensity. Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and sustainer of the orchestra, was loyal to Dr. Karl Muck, then conductor and becoming more and more of a storm-centre; and he was loyal to his country. "It needed but a stray match," writes Mr. Howe, "to ignite the gunpowder that lay scattered all about. That match was dropped in Providence, R. I."

From then on, Mr. Howe tells how an over-zealous and afterwards discredited spy-hunting editor of the Providence Journal dropped the match by declaring that Muck and his men should play the "Star Spangled Banner" at the orchestra's concert in Providence that evening. Various patriotic societies backed him up, and the matter was laid before Major Higginson and C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra. They decided since there was no time for rehearsal that the anthem had better not be played. Dr. Muck was not consulted and knew nothing of the affair until the next morning. Yet all over the country there spread like wildfire the false report that a German conductor had refused to play our national hymn.

Reasons Never Made Public

Like a snow ball rolling down hill the agitation against Muck grew. Scandalous charges were laid at his door, and in March, 1918, he was interned at Atlanta by the federal government as an enemy alien "on grounds that were never made public."

Believing that the Symphony Orchestra through him as spokesman should exonerate the man who served the band so well, who is still, in his old age, one of the great masters of the baton and who is honored throughout Europe, Mr. Howe goes on to say: "In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy. There were, of course, many instances in which government officials proved themselves incapable of resisting popular clamor, and adopted courses which would have been unthinkable in times of peace. This was one of the most conspicuous of those cases."

Symphony

An Afternoon Of a Stranger And Schumann

Piatigorsky's Signal Debut, Concerto, Overture and "Spring" Symphony

IXE, the untamable friend of this department, has a theory about concertos for violoncello. As he admits, it will never be put into practice; but, since he invented it, he believes it valid. None of these concertos—he contends—is interesting or even musical throughout. Somewhere or other they decline into sterile exercise by the composer, the virtuoso or both. But each may have a single movement that commends it. Accordingly, Ixe would assemble a discriminating jury. Before it the repertory concertos should be set in array — Haydn's, Boccherini's, Schumann's, Dvorák's, Lalo's, Saint-Saëns's. Others, less often played, like Delius's or Elgar's, might also be included. From these the jury should choose the most interesting Allegro, the most songful slow movement, the most agreeable finale. The chosen fragments would then be tested for "musicality." The three that best survived both scrutinies would forthwith be joined together and proffered to the waiting virtuosi as a Synthetic Concerto for Violoncello, suitable for most occasions. It might—Ixe agrees—exhibit some divergences in substance, texture and style; but it would gain sustained interest and desirable "musicality." If only the conductors as program-makers and the violoncellists as performers could be persuaded, then. . . .

By this time Ixe is turning into his own door; but his facetious theorizing has played about an impregnable fact. Except to students of the instrument and to devotees of the composer, no concerto for violoncello in the current repertory has an independent, self-contained existence. It flourishes or it withers as utility for violoncellists. According as it is played, it stirs interest and gives pleasure. The player is, or should be, more engaging than the piece. Therefore when Mr. Piatigorsky agreed to Schumann's Concerto for his début yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert, his potential listeners recalled his reported distinctions as violoncellist rather than any quality in the Concerto itself.

Schumann wrote it in his final years to the usual wifely admiration. It has not endured among his major works. It has been rarely played at Symphony Hall, once, for an anniversary, after a twenty-year interval. When Schumann is busying himself with passage-work, as the technical term goes; with more or less displayful measures, with the music and the instrument in quick or abrupt motion, he is not more fortunate than his fellow-composers for violoncello and orchestra, less inventive and neat-handed than some. Wiser on this score than the admiring Clara, he writes as few such pages as possible; at every opportunity prefers sustained and flowing song. There, when such a violoncellist as Mr. Piatigorsky plays him, he emerges as the Schumann of warm melody, poetic fancy and romantic vision, capable of finely touched euphonies between solo-instrument and orchestra; felicitous, as always, when form, matter and manner do not overtax him.

Mr. Piatigorsky, moreover, is a master-violoncellist. His tall figure and well-chiselled features arrest the eye as he walks to his place. Seated and addressing himself to his task, he does not wear the serene, exalted air, say, of Mr. Casals in prime. His bends over his instrument; his shoulders sway, his head tosses, as one absorbed and enkindled. In quick and semi-displayful measures, he draws from the submissive violoncello a tone of remarkable lightness and flexibility; keeps it in motion with as rare a grace. Under his hand arabesques twine like tendrils about the main stem. Into "passage-work" he infuses elegance. In sustained song, Mr. Piatigorsky neither thickens, darkens nor deadens tone. He is all for musical beauty and musical feeling, both unsentimentalized. He is clear without dryness; rich-toned without smear or blur. He molds phrases like a sensitive singer upon his instrument. He is adept with graduation and transition. His hand and ear are quick to the smoothest of euphonies. His rhythm propels like an inner force, neither driving hard nor sagging weak.

Such a musician, as distinct from a mere "soloist," shades and curves a melody with double sense of its intrinsic quality and of the quality of the violoncello as transmitting, charactering voice. His sense of style releases the mood of romantic revery that is often source of Schumann's song. Across a great concert-room he keeps it wistful and intimate revelation. Yet how wary is Mr. Piatigorsky of that slight excess which may turn it into platitudinous, quasi-Teutonic sentiment! After this poise and measure, the magnificent sonorities, the spacious periods, the rhapsodic ardor of the cadenza toward the end. Throughout, the musician glorified the virtuoso; the tone-poet released the poetry of the instrument and, such as it is, of the concerto. As there are new pianists, so there is a new violoncellist risen.

Dr. Koussevitzky fitted Mr. Piatigorsky's concerto into an "All-Schumann" program. The conductor blends many temperaments into the single one that, whatever the momentary cast, prevails in the concert-hall. Like other modernists with Mendelssohn, he believes in Schumann warmly, plays him as an act of faith. From October into April he had overlooked him; now for these large amends. It is custom to deprecate "one-composer" programs, unless a festival gives them warrant. In ordinary courses Bach or Brahms, Beethoven or Wagner—to say nothing of the audience—may hardly bear the strain. Schumann, next to never, is invited to endure it. Some, indeed, came into Symphony Hall on Friday prepared to say that it was beyond his strength or their patience. To each listener his particular re-action; but it is only the truth to say that the audience, bye and large, gave not a sign of boredom. The impending holiday did not lessen its numbers; it listened intently, applauded heartily, stayed to the end. Which is not to say that Dr. Koussevitzky should be encouraged in his latent ambition to play all of Schumann's symphonies in a single season. Better a revival of the best of his choral scenes from "Faust"—say Part III—which some believe an unjustly neglected music.

The objection, if any, to yesterday's program was its preference for Schumann's later work; whereas twentieth-century inclination tends toward his earlier music. The concerto for violoncello is dated 1850: the overture to Byron's "Manfried," 1848. Time and fashion set against the romantic Englishman's "dramatic poem"; in degree against the German's romantic overture. Most of us had rather read about Byron in Monsieur Maurois's two volumes than dip into him in twice as many more. We have lost our relish for "his fancy drapery," and in those trappings the very personal "Manfred" is lavishly clothed. Even the program-book did not expatiate upon the drama, leaving us to listen to the overture as so much music. It lost nothing and gained not a little by Dr. Koussevitzky's "reading." By sympathetic imaginotion, by the orchestral instrument upon which he played, he wrung the utmost out of every period; yet steadily kept the whole firm-shaped and in motion.

The overture began and ended sombre and despairing. There were measures of passion and frenzy and calm, gloomy, haunted. The gentler theme of Astarte ran restless and pathetic course. Skeptical listeners could not hear uninterested, unimpressed: but the suspicion also intruded that for us of 1931 Schumann was also going through the romantic motions. Of course, for himself and his generation they were genuine and stirring—so intense that he writes with the force and freedom of maturity. But within them, for us, lurks the pathos of distance. It touches our sensibilities with regret for a romantic mood that we cannot regain. It also dims the composer's fires. Who in 1931 can feel Byronically even when Schumann would light the flame? Time and change are devitalizing this "Manfred" overture. It lacks the musical power and splendor that preserve Beethoven's "Leonora"; the theater-quality that keeps alive Wagner's overture to the fate-hunted "Dutchman."

Yet who thinks of time and change when the "Spring Symphony" out of Schumann's earlier years is sounding? For most of us the return of spring is everlasting romantic impetus. It is the annual, not the daily, miracle—the greater for its rarer occurrence. Out of that impetus the Symphony in B-flat was born to be perdurable and irresistible. There are faults and lapses in the orchestral texture. Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic insight, skilful hand and vigorous will may not always abate them. Even the tone of the orchestra—of surpassing richness in the slow movement, glowing with life in the proclamatory measures of the beginning and the end—may not hide all the inadvertencies. But though the whole symphony runs a spring-like freshness and ardor to set beauty musing and to call fantasy into play. Out of vernal impulses stirring within him in as many melodies, Schumann made one all-embracing symphonic tune. It poetical and homely, earthy and fanciful, local and universal, of the happy Schumanns and of the folk, of the Rhine Country and the world renewed. Spring poems indeed! Here is one written in tones, and near a century alive, young and true.

H. T. P.

New York Laurels In Boston Wre

Mr. Gilman Adds His Chapt To the Garlands for the Symphony Orchestra

UNDER the caption, "Fifty Years a Great Orchestra," Lawrence G man wrote last Sunday in the N York Herald Tribune: "It is half a c tury since that resolute and intellige Mecænas, Henry L. Higginson, arous the citizens of Boston by issuing a sta ment in which he set forth in detail plan for supplying the capital of Mas chusetts with a permanent symph orchestra. His intention, he announce was 'to hire an orchestra of sixty me and a conductor [there were seven four at the opening concert of Oct. 1881] paying them all by the year,' serving to himself 'the right to all the time needed for rehearsals and for co certs, and allowing them to give lesso when they had time.' The orchestra w 'to give in Boston as many serious co certs of classical music as were wante and also to give at other times, and mo especially in the summer, concerts of lighter kind of music, in which should included good dance music; to do t same in neighboring towns and cities far sa is practicable, but certainly to gi Harvard University all that she needs this line, to keep the prices low alway and especially where the lighter concer are in question, because to them m come the poorer people; fifty cents a twenty-five cents being the measure prices.'

"Last [Saturday] night in Boston t orchestra of which Henry L. Higginso dreamed, which he brought into beina which he developed and cherished f more than a generation, concluded i fiftieth season. The great Mr. Higginso could he have been present in the flesh to take a bow from the platform of Sym phony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, migh have been pardoned for feeling satisfie with the issue of his labors and h dreams. He would have been justifie in telling himself (though it is difficult fancy his doing so) that he had been prime agent in the accomplishment that ideal which he exposed in the earlie days of the orchestra's existence when he said: 'The Civil War taught a grea many men that if we were to have a cou try worthy of the name we must wor for it and educate it, as well as fight fo it; and that duty lies upon every indivi ual citizen.'

"That duty, no one more devotedly an unselfishly discharged than Henry Hig ginson. 'I have had my day,' he wrote shortly before his death, to his friend Judge Cabot, 'and have had great com fort from the orchestra.' One can be lieve that, as he added, the burden ha become 'almost intolerable.' It must in deed have seemed so in the tragic sprin of 1918; but one likes to fancy that be fore he came to his end, a year and a half later, the comfort had begun to seem more memorable than the burden.

"The orchestra that Henry Higginso created half a century ago has stood un swervingly throughout its existence fo those esthetic virtues which not only contribute to the glory of musical art but which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express. Other makers of music amongst us other musical institutions—certain of them august and prententious and, alas unashamed—have sometimes lowered their standards, have compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instance of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prodigious effort made and sustained by Higginson was, as he expressed it, 'simply in the interest of good music.' The orchestra has had no other aim throughout its half-century of existence. . . .

"A constant recognition of the truth that a great orchestra is obliged to function unceasingly not alone as a custodian but as a herald and a prophet, has guided the activities of the Boston organization from the start. Obedient to the more dangerous clause of this obligation, Henschel brought forward Brahms Gericke ventured Bruckner and Strauss (during the first performance of the latter's 'Aus Italien' the auditors walked out in platoons'); Muck presented 'La Mer' of Debussy—though he is known to have no love for that composer—and the even less accessible 'Five Orchestral Piece' of Schönberg. Monteux exhibited Stravinsky's 'Petrushka' and 'Sacre du Printemps' in the days before they had become accepted modern classics. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, he has been sleeplessly on the trail of the significant and the innovating, indifferent to the certainty that thy woud affront inhospitable ears, disregarding the indignant subscriber who wrote to a newspaper, I refuse to pay more than a nickel for subway noises.'

"The orchestra continues in its triumphant present what Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle so felicitously calls 'the old story of the instruction of the unwilling —the gradual and difficult direction of desire.' We have observed before, and it is pertinent to observe again, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attutde toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nutured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half century of material conquests."

Spring Rites For a Season Now Closing

Leave-Taking, Music and Other Incidents Bestrewing the Symphonic Friday

THE CONCERT itself shall be example and excuse for the reviewer. Perhaps it was the return of spring weather which made some of us see all things green and count spats a useless and deplorable human invention. Perhaps it was the thirty pages of tables, lists, summaries, indices, that filled more than half the program-book—the annual orgy, on such a May Day more than usually indecent. Perhaps it was the chronological record—the final matinée of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Whatever the cause, the occasion wore a relaxed air—the indomitable Koussevitzky and his equally indomitable orchestra always excepted. They persevered to the end. For the rest of us the present seemed more engaging than the past in spite of the editor's monstrosity of statistics; the future, in turn, more beguiling than the present.

True, we listened not only politely but intently. True again, the last matinée audience of the symphonic year was altogether coughless. Yet were our minds as firm-fixed as our ears upon music and performance? There was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," for instance, with which the concert began. It had not changed as masterful piece of flowing counterpoint. But it was pleasanter to think of the banks of the Rhine—the river flowing between—when the train skirts them en route to Munich, most agreeable of summer cities. Soon Debussy's Faun was peering, tonally, out of his bosky shelter. By the same token, soon the chestnut-trees will be in bloom in Paris and the Seine slip under the bridges gold-sheeted from the westering sun.

Between whiles, too, our tongues would run away from the music in presence. Since familiar numbers, all in high favor, filled the program, there was no one to say "Well! Penstock, I suppose you liked that awful stuff," as they do after new Hindemith or new Honegger. At this late day no seat-mates protest their devotion to Beethoven's Fifth—possibly from the subconscious suspicion that at the back of both their heads is a suppressed desire to flee that hackneyed masterpiece. Much more in tune with the day and the mood were exchanges of spring leave-takings and summer plans, diversified by swift little excursions into the Subscription Office to discover whether next year's seats were certainly booked. For on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor—will begin.

Perhaps the relaxing mood seeped also into the applause; while in such things, as every frequenter of Symphony Hall knows, the matinée audience is law and custom unto itself. At the first pause in Beethoven in C minor, it began to dribble away. Not even a bit of ceremony for the five-months' parting with conductor and orchestra could stay it, when at last Beethoven was weary of repeating his final chords. It summoned the orchestra to its feet; called back the conductor once and twice; clapped out and stamped out farewell. But its collective mind, as usual, was on the door and the car, the taxi and the traffic. Nor, as usual, could it agree to stand unanimously or to sit collectively when it was clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's first entrance. For the standing posture, some will and some will not, whether a passing Japanese Prince or a familiar conductor is the occasion. Whoever the object, there should be an end to these scraggly matinée "homages."

In point of fact the only flood of applause, the afternoon through, followed the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Then it was torrential, alike for the splendor of the music and the passion of the performance. So eager and persistent were these plaudits that they hastened the rites of the day. In the first twenty-minutes of the concert, the orchestra was on its feet, Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin at handshaking; while from the back of the stage to the back of the auditorium everybody was beaming upon everyone else. A bright May afternoon does not invite to amateur program-making. Yet the Prelude might have been better placed at the end of the concert. In itself it is an irresistible music. The performance yesterday drove forward, sonorous and striding, tense and climactic, at moments overmuch so for Wagner's flood of golden tone and the songful waves into which it often breaks. The Prelude not only suits a festal occasion; it teems with the zest of living and doing and pleasuring. At the sound of it romance cries in the street and purges our souls, though we may be as heavy with the years and the flesh and our natural vanities as those self-same burghers of Nuremberg. Some of us breathe the freer; hold our heads the higher, for the hearing of it. It signalled the beginning, it should have crowned the end, of this semi-centennial year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to be noted and at leisure pondered. To scan the "rush seats" in the second balcony was to note a few unoccupied. What say to that with a program of familiar classics—"Die Meistersinger" and "The Faun," "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist list will usually fill every chair? And what again for the scant applause after Debussy's Prelude? It is an acknowledged and untarnished masterpiece. Conductor and orchestra evoke and excel in it. Seldom have they been more in the mood and the atmosphere than when Mr. Laurent sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his oboe, Mr. Fiatschek his clarinet, Mr. Zighera his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his companions their horns. Yet the reward was thin and lukewarm. "The Faun," most undeservedly, may be going out of matinée fashion. More probably, the audience takes piece and performance for granted, which state of mind is one of the pitfalls to perfection at the Symphony Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beethoven's Fifth, the reviewer, reminding his readers of the mood of the day, confidently claims exemption and excuse. With this stroke of his pen he agrees to all that has been said in praise of Strauss's etching in tones, of a comic characterization hardly to be matched within the forms and the means of symphonic music. But as the years accumulate upon his head and "Till's"—to say nothing of the composer's—he is coming to believe that conductors, keen for the details with which Strauss invariably tempts them, take "Till" too little in the vein of folk-tale and broad humor. The folk-tale is unmistakable at the beginning and the end. Till's tonal exercises in the market-place and the court-room hardly accord with the wit and the irony of which we used to hear so much. To the contrary they are good comic stuff to tickle the ribs as well as the ears of hearers. Dr. Koussevitzky steers a middle course. He does well with the measures of folk-tale; but in the clowneries the superlative skill of Strauss and his own orchestra presuades him to over-refinement. By all the legends and on more than one of Strauss's pages "Till" is brash.

Almost always Dr. Koussevitzky renews Beethoven. In the Fifth Symphony he gains his end by an eminently direct and simple version, high heroic none the less; so makes play with the sonorities and the accents of the orchestra. Its tone and his pains, indeed, were timely covering to a slow movement that contains not a little Beethovenish commonplace. . . . For the rest let the reviewer take his pleasure of a concert for its own sake and his; for once a man and a brother and not—God save the mark'—an oracle. He deserves it, at season's end.

H. T. P.

Symphony

An Afternoon Of a Stranger And Schumann

Piatigorsky's Signal Debut, Concerto, Overture and "Spring" Symphony

IXE, the untamable friend of this department, has a theory about concertos for violoncello. As he admits, it will never be put into practice; but, since he invented it, he believes it valid. None of these concertos—he contends—is interesting or even musical throughout. Somewhere or other they decline into sterile exercise by the composer, the virtuoso or both. But each may have a single movement that commends it. Accordingly, Ixe would assemble a discriminating jury. Before it the repertory concertos should be set in array — Haydn's, Boccherini's, Schumann's, Dvorák's, Lalo's, Saint-Saëns's. Others, less often played, like Delius's or Elgar's, might also be included. From these the jury should choose the most interesting Allegro, the most songful slow movement, the most agreeable finale. The chosen fragments would then be tested for "musicality." The three that best survived both scrutinies would forthwith be joined together and proffered to the waiting virtuosi as a Synthetic Concerto for Violoncello, suitable for most occasions. It might—Ixe agrees—exhibit some divergences in substance, texture and style; but it would gain sustained interest and desirable "musicality." If only the conductors as program-makers and the violoncellists as performers could be persuaded, then. . . .

By this time Ixe is turning into his own door; but his facetious theorizing has played about an impregnable fact. Except to students of the instrument and to devotees of the composer, no concerto for violoncello in the current repertory has an independent, self-contained existence. It flourishes or it withers as utility for violoncellists. According as it is played, it stirs interest and gives pleasure. The player is, or should be, more engaging than the piece. Therefore when Mr. Piatigorsky agreed to Schumann's Concerto for his début yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert, his potential listeners recalled his reported distinctions as violoncellist rather than any quality in the Concerto itself.

Schumann wrote it in his final years to the usual wifely admiration. It has not endured among his major works. It has been rarely played at Symphony Hall, once, for an anniversary, after a twenty-year interval. When Schumann is busying himself with passage-work, as the technical term goes; with more or less displayful measures, with the music and the instrument in quick or abrupt motion, he is not more fortunate than his fellow-composers for violoncello and orchestra, less inventive and neat-handed than some. Wiser on this score than the admiring Clara, he writes as few such pages as possible; at every opportunity prefers sustained and flowing song. There, when such a violoncellist as Mr. Piatigorsky plays him, he emerges as the Schumann of warm melody, poetic fancy and romantic vision, capable of finely touched euphonies between solo-instrument and orchestra; felicitous, as always, when form, matter and manner do not overtax him.

Mr. Piatigorsky, moreover, is a master-violoncellist. His tall figure and well-chiselled features arrest the eye as he walks to his place. Seated and addressing himself to his task, he does not wear the serene, exalted air, say, of Mr. Casals in prime. His bends over his instrument; his shoulders sway, his head tosses, as one absorbed and enkindled. In quick and semi-displayful measures, he draws from the submissive violoncello a tone of remarkable lightness and flexibility; keeps it in motion with as rare a grace. Under his hand arabesques twine like tendrils about the main stem. Into "passage-work" he infuses elegance. In sustained song, Mr. Piatigorsky neither thickens, darkens nor deadens tone. He is all for musical beauty and musical feeling, both unsentimentalized. He is clear without dryness; rich-toned without smear or blur. He molds phrases like a sensitive singer upon his instrument. He is adept with graduation and transition. His hand and ear are quick to the smoothest of euphonies. His rhythm propels like an inner force, neither driving hard nor sagging weak.

Such a musician, as distinct from a mere "soloist," shades and curves a melody with double sense of its intrinsic quality and of the quality of the violoncello as transmitting, charactering voice. His sense of style releases the mood of romantic revery that is often source of Schumann's song. Across a great concert-room he keeps it wistful and intimate revelation. Yet how wary is Mr. Piatigorsky of that slight excess which may turn it into platitudinous, quasi-Teutonic sentiment! After this poise and measure, the magnificent sonorities, the spacious periods, the rhapsodic ardor of the cadenza toward the end. Throughout, the musician glorified the virtuoso; the tone-poet released the poetry of the instrument and, such as it is, of the concerto. As there are new pianists, so there is a new violoncellist risen.

Dr. Koussevitzky fitted Mr. Piatigorsky's concerto into an "All-Schumann" program. The conductor blends many temperaments into the single one that, whatever the momentary cast, prevails in the concert-hall. Like other modernists with Mendelssohn, he believes in Schumann warmly, plays him as an act of faith. From October into April he had overlooked him; now for these large amends. It is custom to deprecate "one-composer" programs, unless a festival gives them warrant. In ordinary courses Bach or Brahms, Beethoven or Wagner—to say nothing of the audience—may hardly bear the strain. Schumann, next to never, is invited to endure it. Some, indeed, came into Symphony Hall on Friday prepared to say that it was beyond his strength or their patience. To each listener his particular re-action; but it is only the truth to say that the audience, bye and large, gave not a sign of boredom. The impending holiday did not lessen its numbers; it listened intently, applauded heartily, stayed to the end. Which is not to say that Dr. Koussevitzky should be encouraged in his latent ambition to play all of Schumann's symphonies in a single season. Better a revival of the best of his choral scenes from "Faust"—say Part III—which some believe an unjustly neglected music.

The objection, if any, to yesterday's program was its preference for Schumann's later work; whereas twentieth-century inclination tends toward his earlier music. The concerto for violoncello is dated 1850; the overture to Byron's "Manfried," 1848. Time and fashion set against the romantic Englishman's "dramatic poem"; in degree against the German's romantic overture. Most of us had rather read about Byron in Monsieur Maurois's two volumes than dip into him in twice as many more. We have lost our relish for "his fancy drapery," and in those trappings the very personal "Manfred" is lavishly clothed. Even the program-book did not expatiate upon the drama, leaving us to listen to the overture as so much music. It lost nothing and gained not a little by Dr. Koussevitzky's "reading." By sympathetic imaginotion, by the orchestral instrument upon which he played, he wrung the utmost out of every period; yet steadily kept the whole firm-shaped and in motion.

The overture began and ended sombre and despairing. There were measures of passion and frenzy and calm, gloomy, haunted. The gentler theme of Astarte ran restless and pathetic course. Skeptical listeners could not hear uninterested, unimpressed; but the suspicion also intruded that for us of 1931 Schumann was also going through the romantic motions. Of course, for himself and his generation they were genuine and stirring—so intense that he writes with the force and freedom of maturity. But within them, for us, lurks the pathos of distance. It touches our sensibilities with regret for a romantic mood that we cannot regain. It also dims the composer's fires. Who in 1931 can feel Byronically even when Schumann would light the flame? Time and change are devitalizing this "Manfred" overture. It lacks the musical power and splendor that preserve Beethoven's "Leonora"; the theater-quality that keeps alive Wagner's overture to the fate-hunted "Dutchman."

Yet who thinks of time and change when the "Spring Symphony" out of Schumann's earlier years is sounding? For most of us the return of spring is everlasting romantic impetus. It is the annual, not the daily, miracle—the greater for its rarer occurrence. Out of that impetus the Symphony in B-flat was born to be perdurable and irresistible. There are faults and lapses in the orchestral texture. Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic insight, skilful hand and vigorous will may not always abate them. Even the tone of the orchestra—of surpassing richness in the slow movement, glowing with life in the proclamatory measures of the beginning and the end—may not hide all the inadvertencies. But though the whole symphony runs a spring-like freshness and ardor to set beauty musing and to call fantasy into play. Out of twenty vernal impulses stirring within him in as many melodies, Schumann made one all-embracing symphonic tune. It is poetical and homely, earthy and fanciful, local and universal, of the happy Schumanns and of the folk, of the Rhine Country and the world renewed. Spring poems indeed! Here is one written in tones, and near a century alive, young and true.

H. T. P.

credited spy-hunting editor of the Providence Journal dropped the match by declaring that Muck and his men should play the "Star Spangled Banner" at the orchestra's concert in Providence that evening. Various patriotic societies backed him up, and the matter was laid before Major Higginson and C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra. They decided since there was no time for rehearsal that the anthem had better not be played. Dr. Muck was not consulted and knew nothing of the affair until the next morning. Yet all over the country there spread like wildfire the false report that a German conductor had refused to play our national hymn.

Reasons Never Made Public

Like a snow ball rolling down hill the agitation against Muck grew. Scandalous charges were laid at his door, and in March, 1918, he was interned at Atlanta by the federal government as an enemy alien "on grounds that were never made public."

Believing that the Symphony Orchestra through him as spokesman should exonerate the man who served the band so well, who is still, in his old age, one of the great masters of the baton and who is honored throughout Europe, Mr. Howe goes on to say: "In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy. There were, of course, many instances in which government officials proved themselves incapable of resisting popular clamor, and adopted courses which would have been unthinkable in times of peace. This was one of the most conspicuous of those cases."

199

New York Laurels In Boston Wreat

Mr. Gilman Adds His Chapl To the Garlands for the Symphony Orchestra

Lawrence Gilman

UNDER the caption, "Fifty Years a Great Orchestra," Lawrence G man wrote last Sunday in the N York Herald Tribune: "It is half a c tury since that resolute and intellige Mecænas, Henry L. Higginson, arous the citizens of Boston by issuing a sta ment in which he set forth in detail plan for supplying the capital of Ma chusetts with a permanent symph orchestra. His intention, he announce was 'to hire an orchestra of sixty me and a conductor [there were seven four at the opening concert of Oct. 1881] paying them all by the year,' serving to himself 'the right to all the time needed for rehearsals and for co certs, and allowing them to give lesso when they had time.' The orchestra w 'to give in Boston as many serious co certs of classical music as were wante and also to give at other times, and mo especially in the summer, concerts of lighter kind of music, in which should included good dance music; to do t same in neighboring towns and cities far sa is practicable, but certainly to gi Harvard University all that she needs this line, to keep the prices low alway nad especially where the lighter concer are in question, because to them m come the poorer people; fifty cents a twenty-five cents being the measure prices.'

"Last [Saturday] night in Boston t orchestra of which Henry L. Higginso dreamed, which he brought into bein which he developed and cherished f more than a generation, concluded i fiftieth season. The great Mr. Higginso could he have been present in the flesh to take a bow from the platform of Sym phony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, migh have been pardoned for feeling satisfie with the issue of his labors and h dreams. He would have been justifie in telling himself (though it is difficult fancy his doing so) that he had been prime agent in the accomplishment that ideal which he exposed in the earlie days of the orchestra's existence when he said: 'The Civil War taught a grea many men that if we were to have a cou try worthy of the name we must wor for it and educate it, as well as fight fo it; and that duty lies upon every indivi ual citizen.'

"That duty, no one more devotedly an unselfishly discharged than Henry Hig ginson. 'I have had my day,' he wrote shortly before his death, to his friend Judge Cabot, 'and have had great com fort from the orchestra.' One can be lieve that, as he added, the burden ha become 'almost intolerable.' It must in deed have seemed so in the tragic spring of 1918; but one likes to fancy that be fore he came to his end, a year and a half later, the comfort had begun to seem more memorable than the burden.

"The orchestra that Henry Higginso created half a century ago has stood un swervingly throughout its existence fo those esthetic virtues which not only contribute to the glory of musical art but which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express. Other makers of music amongst us other musical institutions—certain of them august and prententious and, alas unashamed—have sometimes lowered their standards, have compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instance of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prodigious effort made and sustained by Higginson was, as he expressed it, 'simply in the interest of good music.' The orchestra has had no other aim throughout its half-century of existence. . . .

"A constant recognition of the truth that a great orchestra is obliged to function unceasingly not alone as a custodian but as a herald and a prophet, has guided the activities of the Boston organization from the start. Obedient to the more dangerous clause of this obligation, Henschel brought forward Brahms Gericke ventured Bruckner and Strauss (during the first performance of the latter's 'Aus Italien' the auditors walked out in platoons'); Muck presented 'La Mer' of Debussy—though he is known to have no love for that composer—and the even less accessible 'Five Orchestral Piece' of Schönberg. Monteux exhibited Stravinsky's 'Petrushka' and 'Sacre du Printemps' in the days before they had become accepted modern classics. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, he has been sleeplessly on the trail of the significant and the innovating, indifferent to the certainty that thy woud affront inhospitable ears, disregarding the indignant subscriber who wrote to a newspaper, I refuse to pay more than a nickel for subway noises.'

"The orchestra continues in its triumphant present what Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle so felicitously calls 'the old story of the instruction of the unwilling —the gradual and difficult direction of desire.' We have observed before, and it is pertinent to observe again, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attutde toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nutured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and tramplings of a half century of material conquests."

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

A Wartime Chronicle of The Symphony Orchestra

New Chapters Added to The Record Justice at Last to Dr. Muck The Subsequent Years

FROM birth independent and individualized, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has celebrated its semi-centennial in its own way. The first concert, last autumn, of its fiftieth year was a repetition of the first concert of its first year under the same conductor, George Henschel, still in full exercise of his powers. But—observe the individual touch—the perdurable Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" was substituted as final number for the outworn "Jubel Overture" of Weber. Any properly regimented orchestra would have begun the anniversary season with the inevitable "Symphonic Ode" written for the occasion. At Symphony Hall it was third item in the second program. What with fifty years of conductors, players, audiences, records, memories, what not, most orchestras would have waived composers into the middle distance. The Boston Orchestra shaped its semi-centennial concerts to honor them living and dead. To the living—Stravinsky, Hindemith, Honegger, Roussel and sundry others—it gave commissions, bidding them speak for our time in their own way, with the freedom that is the life-blood of music. For the dead and consecrated, it arranged a notable Bach Festival, from the Mass in B minor downward; twined into it the anniversary homage to its own "founder and sustainer," the late Henry Higginson. Finally, it now resumes the publication of its own history.

In 1914, M. A. De Wolfe Howe wrote and the Houghton Mifflin Company published—to mark Mr. Higginson's eightieth birthday—the chronicle of the orchestra from the earliest times through the spring preceding the German war. Today it is re-published by the same company, revised, enlarged, continuing the chronicle to the end of this fiftieth season. Mr. Howe has added a chapter, headed "Interlude," about the war-years, the withdrawal of Mr. Higginson from control, the transfer of the orchestra to trustees. Mr. J. N. Burk of the staff at Symphony Hall has written two more about the interregnum of Rabaud, the renewal of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its ascent to old and new place through the six seasons of Dr. Koussevitzky.

These additions fill forty pages. Upon them follw, as appendices, the address of Bliss Perry in commemoration of Mr. Higginson at a coficert of the Bach Festival; complete and dated lists of the music played by the orchestra through these fifty years; of the personnel and of the "assisting artists." At the end, before the index, stands a brief catalogue of the ancient instruments in the Casadesus Collection at Symphony Hall. The book may be had of the publishers and at the shops for $2.50. Patrons of the Symphony Concerts may purchase it at Symphony Hall, by mail order to W. H. Brennan, for $1.50.

The War-Years

Since new plates were struck, minor corrections were made here and there in the original volume. Otherwise the first 130 pages of the re-published history contain no fresh matter. Then begins Mr. Howe's "Interlude" of 1914-1918. It is written with his customary clearness, temperance and fairness. It sets forth only authenticated facts. It is work of a chronicler rather than a critic, still less of a gossip. Against a background almost incredible in retrospect, a cumulative hysteria of partisanship and credulity, move Mr. Higginson racked with perplexities and loyalties; Dr. Muck, a German conductor, and his orchestra, "in the German tradition," pursuing their professional courses; a public in Boston and elsewhere, half-irritated by their presence, half-persuaded by their merit. Incidentally, Mr. Howe notes the visit of the orchestra, in 1915, to the World's Fair at San Francisco—the longest journey that it has yet made. He forgets, if he ever knew, the amusing encounter there of the French Saint-Saëns and the German Muck; their interchange of compliments over the conductor's performance of the composer's "Organ Symphony."

In this troubled fashion but with undiminished audiences and in unlessened quality the orchestra survived the first three, ostensibly neutral, years of wartime. In the spring of 1917, the United States joined the Allies. Individual and mass-feeling against Germans and all things German was in seething ferment. (It was then the American world learned that Beethoven was a Hollander.) The position at Symphony Hall became more and more difficult; while Mr. Higginson seemed to his friends "a weary and perplexed old man of eighty-three who was simply trying, as always, to discover his duty and do it"—torn as he was between loyalties as a citizen and obligations to his orchestra. Since all things in America must be personified, Dr. Muck was the pivot of those who attacked and those who defended Mr. Higgnison. Then came the much-mooted incident of the playing of "The Star-Spangled Banner," of which Mr. Howe sets down a veracious and quotable version:

"On the morning of Oct. 30, 1917, the Providence Journal, whose editor at the time was completely discredited a few months later for the excesses of his zeal as a spy-chaser, contained an editorial demanding the playing of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' at the Providence concert of the orchestra announced for that evening. The editorial ended with these words:

"It is as good a time as any to put Professor Muck to the test. The Boston Symphony Orchestra should play 'The Star-Spangled Banner' in Providence tonight.' In the afternoon of that day, while Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, was conferring with Mr. Higginson at his office in State street, they received telegrams from Providence, signed by the chairman of the Liberty Loan Committee of Rhode Island and by women representing musical and other organizations, none of these signers being subscribers to the Boston concerts there, demanding, as The Journal had done that morning, the playing of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' at the concert a few hours later. The members of the orchestra and its conductor were on the very point of taking train to Providence. There was no time for a rehearsal, though the regular playing of 'The Star-Spangled Banner' at the Pop Concerts of the preceding May and June by a considerable portion of the full orchestra would have facilitated that process.

"There can be little question now that it would have been wiser to accede to the request, in spite of its lateness, and to contrive somehow to overcome the obstacles. Dr. Muck was not consulted—indeed, he never heard until the next day that any request for the playing of the national anthem had been made, and, on the judgment of his patron and manager, had been put aside as impracticable. Yet the newspapers of the country received from Providence a despatch, widely printed the next morning, setting forth the affair in a prejudicial light.

"Thus the gunpowder was lighted, and the blaze was formidable. It made little matter that Mr. Higginson, a few days later, after announcing at a Symphony Hall Concert that Dr. Muck would thenceforth include 'The Star-Spangled Banner' in his programs, and that he had offered his resignation, which would receive earnest though obviously reluctant consideration, declared: "Above all things I want Dr. Muck exonerated of that false charge inculcated by some of the papers that he refused to play the national anthem. If the public wants to throw any stones, let them throw them at me, not at the orchestra or the leader. I don't care how many they throw at me."

Justice to Dr. Muck

Mr. Howe proceeds with a compressed account of the attacks upon Dr. Muck and the orchestra in Baltimore and New York; passes, without much intervening chronicle, to the arrest and the internment of Dr. Muck as a dangerous enemy; upon this final outcome writes clear comment:

> In justice to both Mr. Higginson and Dr. Muck, it should be said at this later day that, in respect to the charge on which Dr. Muck was held, there has never been shown any reason why Mr. Higginson should not have stood behind him, or any reason why he should have been punished as an alien enemy. There were, of coure, many instances in which Government officials proved themselves incapable of resisting popular clamor, and adopted courses which would have been unthinkable in times of peace. This was one of the most conspicuous of these cases.

There is no reason to doubt that Mr. Howe sets down truth and distributes even-handed justice. From his record, Mr. Higginson, the management of the orchestra, Dr. Muck himself, emerge unscathed, save for tactical errors readily explainable by the stress, excitement and animosities of a half-incredible time. The chronicler's only reflection upon Dr. Muck is a line about his forfeiture of Mr. Higginson's confidence on other grounds. It is to the honor of the Symphony Orchestra and in accord with its traditions that the illustrious conductor who first raised it to the highest rank, should be thus cleared of war-time aspersions. A true and faithful record is at last written in its own authorized history. Toward Dr. Muck a long-standing obligation is finally discharged.

Interregnum

Mr. Burk here takes up the tale, writing in his turn with the temperance and tolerance, the accuracy and fairness, that distinguish Mr. Howe, keeping likewise to the field of the annalist, who records courses and events rather than criticizes either the wisdom or the results. Under a board of trustees, the orchestra becomes a corporate institution rather than an individual possession—a material change, by the test of time, for the better. In deference to the prevailing mood, the orchestra is cleared of "enemy aliens" and a French conductor, Henri Rabaud, is summoned from Paris. A choral concert celebrates the victory of the Allied and Associated Powers. Only the classic German composers may have place on the programs. A year persuades both the trustees and the conductor to the wisdom of parting.

Mr. Burk is tolerant and detached indeed. There is no hint that the Parisian musical hierarchy, official and academic—the hierarchy that extolled Saint Saëns and belittled Debussy and Ravel—would lay its deadening hand upon the Symphony Concerts; that under Rabaud they declined in scope, quality and the public estimation. Perhaps it is as well to leave this year of interregnum in befitting obscurity. An orchestra that could survive disruption under Muck and decline under Rabaud had reason to trust the future. At least the whole toll of the war-period had been paid.

The Years of Monteux

Then began under Pierre Monteux the renewal of the orchestra, the re-animation of the concerts, the regaining of an interested public, the pursuit of novel policies, under Pierre Monteux. An open-minded, wide-ranging, liberal-spirited Parisian succeeds worthily to the conductor's stand. The orchestra gradually becomes cosmopolitan in membership. The scope of the programs steadily widens until they are assembled from the whole of Europe, the best in American; until there is room for the bold new music of the new men—the post-war generation. Mr. Monteux labors faithfully; plies the abilities that the orchestra needs; re-establishes it in Boston, though other cities that it visits remain cool.

The so-called "strike" of 1920, with incidents in the concert-hall, the withdrawal of practiced members, futile intervention by the excluded and malevolent "Union," hinders progress. Mr. Monteux takes it all in the day's work; re-constitutes the string choir; finds new and desirable players; retrieves the lost ground; continues the upward progress. When his term ends in the spring of 1924, a cosmopolitan orchestra had succeeded the German orchestra (with a French alloy) of the Higginsonian years. The programs are liberalized. The doors of Symphony Hall are open to a new public and to a new time. Again the Symphony Concerts are on an upward course. Say that Gericke first schooled the orchestra and set its standards; that Dr. Muck perfected it; but add also that out of adversity Pierre Monteux, with the trustees, the management and the Bostonian public behind him, renewed and re-established it. Mr. Burk—it is pleasure to write—does him full justice.

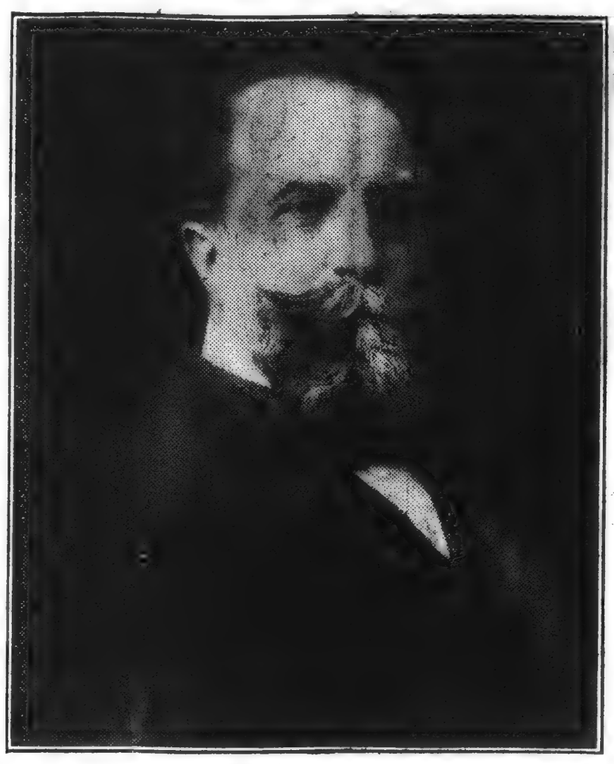
Into This Present

The Koussevitzkyian period fills the final chapter. As in the distant days of Nikisch, the more recent days of Muck, the conductor is again a "personality," potent upon orchestra, audiences, the public at home, the public abroad, the whole course of the concerts. The orchestra remains cosmopolitan; becomes a band of virtuosi in prime; regains the quality and the prestige at which Dr. Muck left it; maintains and individualizes both. Again it is made in the image of a masterful conductor. The eighteenth-century composers return to just place in the repertory; the classics hold their own; outmoded nineteenth-century truck is discarded; the door is opened wide to new composers and brave adventures. Choruses are joined to the orchestra and choral pieces become a part of the repertory. Notable festivals, for Beethoven, for Brahms, for Bach, are arranged and accomplished. Guest-conductors, often composers as well, are bidden to two pairs of concerts each season. Composers come also to conduct in their music, to sit by at the preparation, to grace the concerts at which it is produced. Two supplementary series are added; win and hold a public. The "assisting artist" ceases to be an intrusive decoration; shares only in the performance of symphonic or choral music to which he or she is summoned.

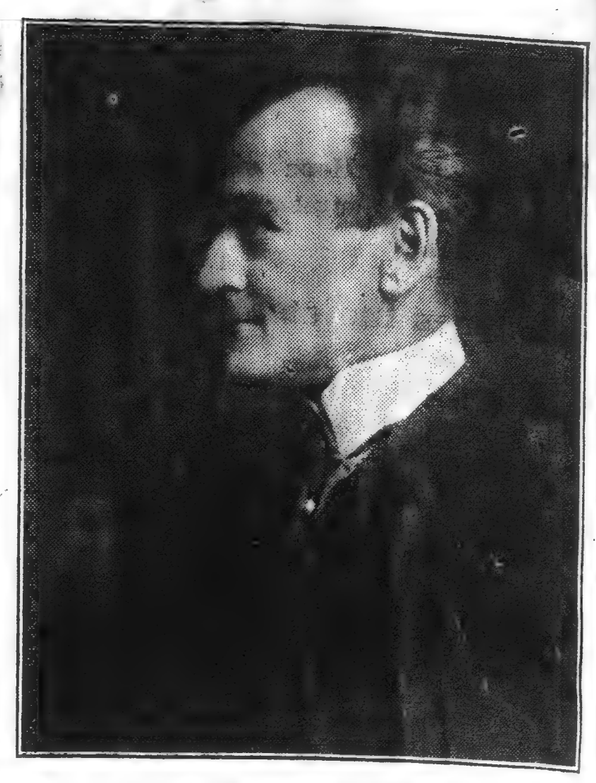
The Symphony Concerts of Boston rise to an international fame. They teem with vitality and ambition; assemble the musical life of our time. They function not only for as perfect performance as conductor and orchestra may accomplish; but also for the progress of the whole art of music freed from museum-bondage. The mind, the spirit, the will, the ceaseless energy and ambition of Serge Koussevitzky enter in and possess orchestra, trustees and management. The public answers and holds faithful. Gericke began and Muck brought to climax the first period of the orchestra. Mr. Monteux foreshadowed and Dr. Koussevitzky has achieved the second. Modestedly but pridefully, always broad-minded, Mr. Burk writes these annals. As he truly adds, there are no steps backward.

H. T. P.

From These Four the Boston Orchestra



Wilhelm Gericke (1884-89)
Who Schooled It



Karl Muck (1912-18)
Who Perfected It

Pierre Monteux (1919-24)
Who Renewed It

Serge Koussevitzky (1924-31)
Who Full-Rounded It

(Photographs by Garo)

Koussevitzky Cancels Milan Date Owing to Toscanini Case

Cables Scala Director Protest Against "Unbelievable Outrage"

ITALIAN CONDUCTOR VIRTUAL PRISONER

Herald May 22

[Wireless to The Herald]

PARIS, May 21—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced his refusal to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the ground that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

He cabled the Scala Theatre tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offence against the whole artistic world, and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics, and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

(Continued on Page Four)

KOUSSEVITZKY CANCELS DATE AT SCALA, MILAN

(Continued from Page One)

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival, that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract.

Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini were able to reach him by telephone at Milan today and learned that his movements for the time being are subject entirely to the will of the Fascist police. He should leave Milan within the next 48 hours to keep an engagement at Vienna, but the Italian authorities had given no intimation that they would permit him to go, he said, although they told him that they would eventually return his passport.

He said that the treatment he had received in his own country had greatly affected his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor. Minister of Communications Costanzo Ciano and Under Secretary of Interior Leandro Arpinati were present.

Toscanini was about to raise his bation when several Fascist youths demanded that he play the two patriotic airs. He refused, they struck and slapped him and he left the theatre in a rage, followed by members of the audience who shouted and hooted at him. Twenty persons who shouted "Long Live Toscanini," were arrested.

The Bologna concert hall has been the scene of many of Toscanini's outstanding triumphs, and its audiences know him well. He had refused on several previous occasions to play the royal march and the Fascist hymn on the ground that they were not good music. His objections, he said, were based entirely on artistic grounds.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR BARS MILAN

Koussevitzky Will Not Make Concert a Political Event

Sun-Dispatch May 26

PARIS, May 25 (U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversey between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitzky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala Theatre in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today.

CONCERTS NOT POLITICS

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defence of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitzky infomed the Scala directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Will Break Contract

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that Koussevitzky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting on breaking his contract.

Recalls Soviet Russia

He said that he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia—which I have quit."

Toscanini Calm, He Says; Cancels Vienna Concerts

Conductor Sends Word He Is Recovering From Fascist Attack; to Go to Bayreuth

Sun. NY May 23

Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York and chief conductor of the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth, is recovering from injuries inflicted by Fascists in Bologna, Italy, when he refused to start a concert with the Fascist hymn "Giovanezza" and, according to a cable message received yesterday in this city, will be able to conduct at Beyreuth in July and August, though his engagement to direct two symphony concerts in Vienna next week had to be canceled.

"I am tranquil," ran the message, which was received by his American secretary, Bruno Zirato. "I am not going to Vienna, but I shall be in Bayreuth as scheduled. Thank all my friends for their kind greetings to me."

The message was sent from Milan, Mr. Toscanini's home, to which he was ordered by Fascist officials in Bologna after the attack on him by a mob of Fascist youths May 14. Following his arrivala aian Milan there was a demonstration in his behalf which interrupted a concert at La Scala Opera House and resulted in the arrest of a score of the demonstrants.

Mr. Toscanini had expected to be in Vienna Tuesday to start rehearsals for his two concerts there, one of which was to have been given today and the other, Monday. At Bayreuth he is to conduct five performances of "Parsifal" and five performances of "Tanhauser," the first to be given July 21 and the last, August 19.

At the time of the attack on him in Bologna, he was conducting the first of two concerts in memory of the Italian composer, Giuseppe Martucci, an associate of Mr. Toscanini in the latter's earlier career.

Two Soldiers Guard His Home

MILAN, Italy, May 22 (AP).—Two soldiers and a half dozen detectives have been posted as a guard outside the home of Arturo Toscanini. Last night a group of students staged a hostile demonstration outside the house, cheering the news that Toscanini's passport had been suspended temporarily by the government. It is expected that the suspension will be lifted in a day or two.

Koussevitsky Indignant

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

Copyright, 1931, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, May 22.—Strong representations are being made from Milan to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he reconsider his decision to cancel his engagement for the La Scala June festival there, it was learned here today. He broke the contract as a protest against the treatment of Arturo Toscanini.

"The slap in the face which Toscanini received at Bologna was an insult not only to him but to artists generally," Koussevitsky said to this correspondent today. "I have been asked several times by the management of La Scala to rescind my cancelation, but for the present I shall take no action in that direction pending further developments."

Koussevitsky said he had not heard that Toscanini's passport had been taken away and that he was unable to leave Italy. It is affirmed in anti-Fascist quarters that not only has the passport been taken but that Toscanini

KOUSSEVITZKY SNUBS LA SCALA

Refuses to Reconsider Cancelling Date

Pst May 26

PARIS, May 22—Strong representations are being made from Milan to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he reconsider his decision to cancel his engagement for the La Scala June festival there, it was learned here today. He broke the contract as a protest against the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, and for the present is maintaining his decision and awaiting further developments in the case.

"The slap in the face which Toscanini received at Bologna was an insult not only to him, but to artists generally," Koussevitzky said to this correspondent today. "I have been asked several times by the management of La Scala to rescind my cancellation, but for the present I shall take no action in that direction, pending further developments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
MAY 17 1931

Orchestra Of Boston Is to Tour

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to tour again next season, and that we are to hear it again in Pittsburgh, together with the receipt of a most interesting volume, a 50-year history of that excellent organization, gives grounds for comparison between the ups and downs of the Boston players and of our own budding orchestra.

Boston was lucky from the very first. Col. Henry H. Higginson as a young man had the ideal urge to go away from business and home, and in that most charming capital of all the world, Vienna, in his most impressionable years, to drink in the musical culture of that city.

As an Apprentice

He went as an apprentice, not as a dilletante, and when his body refused to acquiesce to the trying demands made upon it as a practicing artist, his mind had already learned the fundamentals which were to become the guiding principles of his orchestra.

In Boston, Col. Higginson was again to become a successful financier. He was too well aware of the financial difficulties of founding an orchestra, and so he made certain that his bank book would take care of his ideals. And when his bank book showed him the way, he spent lavishly, but never recklessly, and gave Boston and the world a great orchestra.

Because he could be the czar, the orchestra was always a stable organization. But his regency was noble. Col. Higginson chose his players and his conductors out of a knowledge of men and artists that was deep-rooted and substantial.

Critics Ignored

Because he paid the bill, he could afford to ignore criticism against his regard for the union, society, the foreign musician, new music, and many petty matters that keep any musical organization always near shipwreck. He brought to Boston such men as Paur, Nikisch and Muck, and was loyal to all, for which, in war time, his patriotism was questioned.

The story of the first years of this orchestra reads like the life story of our own. They were years of weeding and preparing the soil for its more luxuriant years. They were years of experiment, of training of childish audiences. Each director brought new character to the ensemble, but in its first decade the Boston players had indeed established their personality.

Lesson of Folly

The war years tell a lesson of folly such as we dislike in our saner moments to recall. Even in Pittsburgh we saw enough of that stupidity when we hated German music, but listened to it with delight when offered in the same phrasing but in absurdly translated titles. And then the rebirth, with Koussevitsky, whose triumphant success has placed his orchestra among the world's best, gives us courage to think that we might, too, some day boast of such an institution.

Our orchestra is making headway. We have had no such "angel" as Col. Higginson to lead the way with so sure a hand. But we do have far-seeing men and women whose spirit is still fighting and clearing the way for success of our own players. Surely our public can no longer be blind to their endeavors. Now is the time to say a word of approval, and to lend a hand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

MAY 16 1931

Pity The Italians

Toscanini's reception as guest conductor of a symphony orchestra in Bologna will bring reminiscent smiles from American concertgoers. Toscanini flatly refused to open his Italian concert with the Fascist anthem, saying that the promptings of his artistic conscience would not allow him to, and that he had come to conduct a concert, not to play anthems. For this he was slapped and roughly handled by a group of young Fascists.

We had our taste of this sort of thing during the war days. Who has forgotten the treatment accorded to Karl Mück, a superb musician and the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who happened also to be a German? Wasn't he roughly handled because some patrioteers thought he should play The Star-Spangled Banner at a different place on his program? But that was at a time when the nation was hysterical with war fever. When peace came, all but the tone-deaf promptly admitted again that Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms and a dozen others were tolerably decent composers, and we even listened with composure when Germans played these German works.

Pity Italy, then! For in Italy they suffer chronically from the war fever, even in peace time. Every morning, no matter how placid the international scene, good Fascists must arise and go about the day with taut nerves and suspicious glances, seeking ever a slur on the national honor. It must be exhausting. This Mussolini doubtless has his good points; but the way he keeps his subjects keyed up is downright inhuman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAY 18 1931

Musical Art and Politics.

The experience of Arturo Toscanini, orchestra conductor, in his native Italy at the hands of indignant fascisti is reminiscent of a happening in this country during war time. The Teutonic leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert on the ground that it was not "good music." Public indignation was highly aroused and shortly afterward the Teuton left the country for a more harmonious clime. In Toscanini's case there was no real justification for a row, certainly none for partisan indignation. Prior to the recital at Bologna he was met by a delegation of fascists and requested to play the marching song of their political organization as a prelude to the concert. This was because a certain person was in the audience, an undersecretary of the ministry and father-in-law of Mussolini's daughter. Just whether he was to be honored by the fascist marching song because of his official or his personal relationship was not established. At any rate, Toscanini refused, declaring that the composition in question was not "good music," just as Carl Muck refused to play the American national anthem—it had not then been so declared and established by law, as it has since been, but it was generally recognized as such—on the score of its musical deficiency.

Carl Muck was wrong, decidedly wrong, in his refusal to play the selection that stood for the American national spirit, unless he felt that to do so was a betrayal of his German allegiance. In that case he had no ground for complaint. He forfeited his position for the sake of his national spirit. Toscanini was under no obligation whatever to play the fascist march, because requested by a group of political partisans, or because of the presence in the audience of Mussolini's daughter's father-in-law and one of his undersecretaries. He is perhaps to be admired for his discrimination as a musician. He might easily have compromised, however, for the sake of the higher interest of his art, even though the music was rubbish. The artistic temperament would not permit such a concession. He suffered in body and probably will have to quit his work in Italy, as long as fascism rules there. Italy is really the loser from such absurd political fanaticism.

Koussevitzky Cancels Milan Date Owing to Toscanini Case

Cables Scala Director Protest Against "Unbelievable Outrage"

ITALIAN CONDUCTOR VIRTUAL PRISONER

Herald May 22

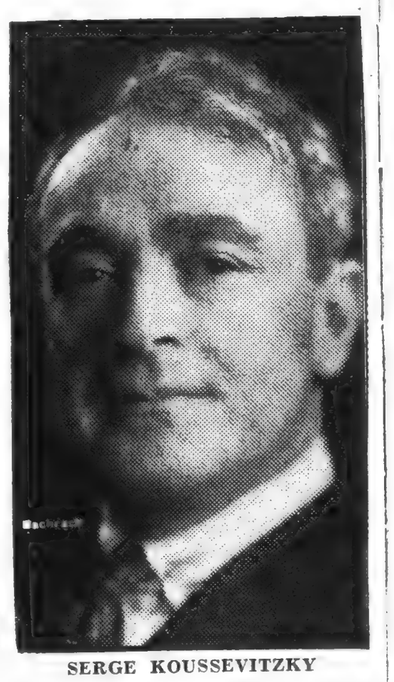
[Wireless to The Herald]

PARIS, May 21—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today announced his refusal to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the ground that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

He cabled the Scala Theatre tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offence against the whole artistic world, and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics, and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

(Continued on Page Four)

KOUSSEVITZKY CANCELS DATE AT SCALA, MILAN

(Continued from Page One)

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival, that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract.

Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini were able to reach him by telephone at Milan today and learned that his movements for the time being are subject entirely to the will of the Fascist police. He should leave Milan within the next 48 hours to keep an engagement at Vienna, but the Italian authorities had given no intimation that they would permit him to go, he said, although they told him that they would eventually return his passport.

He said that the treatment he had received in his own country had greatly affected his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor. Minister of Communications Costanzo Ciano and Under Secretary of Interior Leandro Arpinati were present.

Toscanini was about to raise his bation when several Fascist youths demanded that he play the two patriotic airs. He refused, they struck and slapped him and he left the theatre in a rage, followed by members of the audience who shouted and hooted at him. Twenty persons who shouted "Long Live Toscanini," were arrested.

The Bologna concert hall has been the scene of many of Toscanini's outstanding triumphs, and its audiences know him well. He had refused on several previous occasions to play the royal march and the Fascist hymn on the ground that they were not good music. His objections, he said, were based entirely on artistic grounds.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR BARS MILAN

Koussevitzky Will Not Make Concert a Political Event

PARIS, May 25 (U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversey between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitzky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala Theatre in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today.

CONCERTS NOT POLITICS

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defence of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitzky infomed the Scala directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Will Break Contract

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that Koussevitzky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting on breaking his contract.

Recalls Soviet Russia

He said that he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia—which I have quit."

Toscanini Calm, He Says; Cancels Vienna Concerts

Conductor Sends Word He Is Recovering From Fascist Attack; to Go to Bayreuth

Jub NY May 23

Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York and chief conductor of the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth, is recovering from injuries inflicted by Fascists in Bologna, Italy, when he refused to start a concert with the Fascist hymn "Giovanezza" and, according to a cable message received yesterday in this city, will be able to conduct at Beyreuth in July and August, though his engagement to direct two symphony concerts in Vienna next week had to be canceled.

"I am tranquil," ran the message, which was received by his American secretary, Bruno Zirato. "I am not going to Vienna, but I shall be in Bayreuth as scheduled. Thank all my friends for their kind greetings to me."

The message was sent from Milan, Mr. Toscanini's home, to which he was ordered by Fascist officials in Bologna after the attack on him by a mob of Fascist youths May 14. Following his arrivala aian Milan there was a demonstration in his behalf which interrupted a concert at La Scala Opera House and resulted in the arrest of a score of the demonstrants.

Mr. Toscanini had expected to be in Vienna Tuesday to start rehearsals for his two concerts there, one of which was to have been given today and the other, Monday. At Bayreuth he is to conduct five performances of "Parsifal" and five performances of "Tanhauser," the first to be given July 21 and the last, August 19.

At the time of the attack on him in Bologna, he was conducting the first of two concerts in memory of the Italian composer, Giuseppe Martucci, an associate of Mr. Toscanini in the latter's earlier career.

Two Soldiers Guard His Home

MILAN, Italy, May 22 (AP).—Two soldiers and a half dozen detectives have been posted as a guard outside the home of Arturo Toscanini. Last night a group of students staged a hostile demonstration outside the house, cheering the news that Toscanini's passport had been suspended temporarily by the government. It is expected that the suspension will be lifted in a day or two.

Koussevitsky Indignant

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

Copyright, 1931, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, May 22.—Strong representations are being made from Milan to Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he reconsider his decision to cancel his engagement for the La Scala June festival there, it was learned here today. He broke the contract as a protest against the treatment of Arturo Toscanini.

"The slap in the face which Toscanini received at Bologna was an insult not only to him but to artists generally," Koussevitsky said to this correspondent today. "I have been asked several times by the management of La Scala to rescind my cancelation, but for the present I shall take no action in that direction pending further developments."

Koussevitsky said he had not heard that Toscanini's passport had been taken away and that he was unable to leave Italy. It is affirmed in anti-Fascist quarters that not only has the passport been taken but that Toscanini is followed by agents of the Fascist secret service whenever he leaves his home at Milan. They profess to be unable to advance reasons why such action should be taken.

Officials attached to the Italian Embassy here scout the idea that Toscanini has been in any way embarrassed by the Italian government. No word to that effect, they say, has been received.

BOY ON SIDEWALK HIT BY TROLLEY CA

An accident which police say result[ed] when the rear end of a tunnel [car] bound for Jeffries Point, East Bosto[n] swung over the sidewalk at Orlea[ns] and Maverick street, caused Ken[neth] Bruno, 4, of 89 Orleans street, Ea[st] Boston, to suffer multiple contusio[ns] and abrasions of the body last night. Police said that the child was stan[ding] [in] the burning fluid all over [the] place. Belezos was taken to Qui[ncy] Hospital.

The blaze spread upward to print shop of the William A. Bradf[ord] Publishing Company.

further developments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
MAY 17 1931

Orchestra Of Boston Is to Tour

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to tour again next season, and that we are to hear it again in Pittsburgh, together with the receipt of a most interesting volume, a 50-year history of that excellent organization, gives grounds for comparison between the ups and downs of the Boston players and of our own budding orchestra.

Boston was lucky from the very first. Col. Henry H. Higginson as a young man had the ideal urge to go away from business and home, and in that most charming capital of all the world, Vienna, in his most impressionable years, to drink in the musical culture of that city.

As an Apprentice

He went as an apprentice, not as a dilletante, and when his body refused to acquiesce to the trying demands made upon it as a practicing artist, his mind had already learned the fundamentals which were to become the guiding principles of his orchestra.

In Boston, Col. Higginson was again to become a successful financier. He was too well aware of the financial difficulties of founding an orchestra, and so he made certain that his bank book would take care of his ideals. And when his bank book showed him the way, he spent lavishly, but never recklessly, and gave Boston and the world a great orchestra.

Because he could be the czar, the orchestra was always a stable organization. But his regency was noble. Col. Higginson chose his players and his conductors out of a knowledge of men and artists that was deep-rooted and substantial.

Critics Ignored

Because he paid the bill, he could afford to ignore criticism against his regard for the union, society, the foreign musician, new music, and many petty matters that keep any musical organization always near shipwreck. He brought to Boston such men as Paur, Nikisch and Muck, and was loyal to all, for which, in war time, his patriotism was questioned.

The story of the first years of this orchestra reads like the life story of our own. They were years of weeding and preparing the soil for its more luxuriant years. They were years of experiment, of training of childish audiences. Each director brought new character to the ensemble, but in its first decade the Boston players had indeed established their personality.

Lesson of Folly

The war years tell a lesson of folly such as we dislike in our saner moments to recall. Even in Pittsburgh we saw enough of that stupidity when we hated German music, but listened to it with delight when offered in the same phrasing but in absurdly translated titles. And then the rebirth, with Koussevitsky, whose triumphant success has placed his orchestra among the world's best, gives us courage to think that we might, too, some day boast of such an institution.

Our orchestra is making headway. We have had no such "angel" as Col. Higginson to lead the way with so sure a hand. But we do have far-seeing men and women whose spirit is still fighting and clearing the way for success of our own players. Surely our public can no longer be blind to their endeavors. Now is the time to say a word of approval, and to lend a hand.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

MAY 16 1931

Pity The Italians

Toscanini's reception as guest conductor of a symphony orchestra in Bologna will bring reminiscent smiles from American concertgoers. Toscanini flatly refused to open his Italian concert with the Fascist anthem, saying that the promptings of his artistic conscience would not allow him to, and that he had come to conduct a concert, not to play anthems. For this he was slapped and roughly handled by a group of young Fascists.

We had our taste of this sort of thing during the war days. Who has forgotten the treatment accorded to Karl Mück, a superb musician and the conductor of the Boston Symphony, who happened also to be a German? Wasn't he roughly handled because some patrioteers thought he should play The Star-Spangled Banner at a different place on his program? But that was at a time when the nation was hysterical with war fever. When peace came, all but the tone-deaf promptly admitted again that Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Brahms and a dozen others were tolerably decent composers, and we even listened with composure when Germans played these German works.

Pity Italy, then! For in Italy they suffer chronically from the war fever, even in peace time. Every morning, no matter how placid the international scene, good Fascists must arise and go about the day with taut nerves and suspicious glances, seeking ever a slur on the national honor. It must be exhausting. This Mussolini doubtless has his good points; but the way he keeps his subjects keyed up is downright inhuman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAY 18 1931

Musical Art and Politics.

The experience of Arturo Toscanini, orchestra conductor, in his native Italy, at the hands of indignant fascisti is reminiscent of a happening in this country during war time. The Teutonic leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner" at a concert on the ground that it was not "good music." Public indignation was highly aroused and shortly afterward the Teuton left the country for a more harmonious clime. In Toscanini's case there was no real justification for a row, certainly none for physical violence. Prior to the recital at Bologna he was met by a delegation of fascists and requested to play the marching song of their political organization as a prelude to the concert. This was because a certain person was in the audience, an undersecretary of the ministry and father-in-law of Mussolini's daughter. Just whether he was to be honored by the fascist marching song because of his official or his personal relationship was not established. At any rate, Toscanini refused, declaring that the composition in question was not "good music," just as Carl Muck refused to play the American national anthem—it had not then been so declared and established by law, as it has since been, but it was generally recognized as such—on the score of its musical deficiency.

Carl Muck was wrong, decidedly wrong, in his refusal to play the selection that stood for the American national spirit, unless he felt that to do so was a betrayal of his German allegiance. In that case he had no ground for complaint. He forfeited his position for the sake of his national spirit. Toscanini was under no obligation whatever to play the fascist march, because requested by a group of political partisans, or because of the presence in the audience of Mussolini's daughter's father-in-law and one of his undersecretaries. He is perhaps to be admired for his discrimination as a musician. He might easily have compromised, however, for the sake of the higher interest of his art, even though the music was rubbish. The artistic temperament would not permit such a concession. He suffered in body and probably will have to quit his work in Italy, as long as fascism rules there. Italy is really the loser from such absurd political fanaticism.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAY 18 1931

PAGE DR MUCK

Sig Arturo Toscanini can now sympathize with Dr Karl Muck, the one-time conductor of the famous old Boston Symphony orchestra. The distinguished Italian maestro was treated with inexcusable rudeness in Bologna when he refused to play the Fascist anthem. He did not consider it "good music." Of course Toscanini should have been a little more cautious. Perhaps, however, he felt that the people of Italy would take into consideration the fact that he is an Italian and a temperamental one, at that, with, of course, a lofty knowledge and appreciation of what really constitutes good music. But he failed to reckon with the temperament of the loyal Fascisti with the result that he was not only slapped, but ordered out of the city.

We see many persons turning up their noses and perhaps lifting their eyebrows eloquently over here at such treatment. But they might well recall, in this connection, the case of Dr Muck who as conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra was humiliated and roundly abused althought not actually assaulted because in Providence, R. I., he refused to play our own national anthem on the ground that it was not good music, or was not appropriate to the program which he was presenting, or something like that.

It will be recalled that the incident led to a bitter persecution or prosecution of Dr Muck that ended with his confinement in an interment camp and general execration. But that was in actual war time when we, in common with some of the other nations did a lot of flamboyantly foolish things. Which probably we would repeat under similar circumstances unless we remembered the propaganda that led to some of our inexcusable World war offenses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
MAY 16 1931

Art for Art's Sake.

Arturo Toscanini, the eminent co[n]ductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra, has advanced a naive (but unique) excuse for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at his concert in Bologna. He says that the anthem is not "good music." Signor Toscanini surely the maestro realizes that few national anthems are. The "Star-Spangled Banner" is a musical mediocrity and "God Save the King" is wholly uninspired from the same point of view.

Nevertheless, if a national anthem is rarely good music, it is always good politics. Even in this free country Karl Muck, the German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought trouble upon himself by declining to play the "Star-Spangled Banner" in war time. It is easy to imagine how much more dangerous such a policy would be under the Fascist regime in Italy. Mussolini himself, while traveling incognito, is said to have been warned to rise as the Fascist anthem was played in a motion picture theater there. We suggest that hereafter Toscanini not only play the anthem, but conduct it with one hand raised in the Fascist salute.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL
MAY 19 [illegible]

—oHo—

When the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given a clock the other day by concert subscribers, let us hope that no yokel on the committee wise-cracked about the gift being timely.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER
MAY 18 1931

Those who read of the demonstration in Bologna against the famous conductor, Arturo Toscanini, will be reminded of the fuss that was stirred up when the editor of a Providence paper demanded that Dr. Muck should lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in playing the Star Spangled Banner at a concert which had been arranged in that city during war time. This had never been the practice of the orchestra at its formal concerts. As a matter of fact, Dr. Muck was unfairly criticized in that respect. Subsequently at the request of the management he offered no objections to adding our national anthems to the programs. In Bologna Toscanini's objections to playing the Fascist national anthem appear to have been aesthetic. He did not believe that musically the composition was worthy of his attention. The expedient course, perhaps, would have been to concede something to a popular demand. But Toscanini has not been accustomed to submit to dictation in his artistic endeavors. There is the impression that by Premier Mussolini the incident at Bologna will be overlooked in view of the eminent position of the gifted conductor in the musical world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAY 19 1931

Musical Chauvinism.

From the Baltimore Sun.

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bolog a will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STATE JOURNAL

[illegible] good.

FOOTNOTES.

"If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land," says the Baltimore Sun. "The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who tho consenting to play 'The Star Spangled Banner' whenever he appeared with the Boston symphony orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

"Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short."

The weakest spot of all in our administration of justice is the impunity with which witnesses are allowed to commit perjury, writes Dorothy Dunbar Bromley in Harpers. She writes: "As distinguished from the rare witness who has high ethical standards, the average man on the stand feels no compulsion to tell the truth, first because his conscience makes no such demands upon him and, second, because he has been given no reason to fear that he will be punished if he swears falsely. In all probability he has never heard of anyone who has been arrested for committing perjury, and he may not even know that under the laws of most of our states the offense is a felony, punishable by a number of years in prison."

The trend of the times in New York is illustrated by this story. "Harry is a student of humanity, and he gets his philosophy out of crowds. Today he is obsessed with the idea that no one will take a risk, that everyone has become a conservative. To prove his point he took a $600 diamond ring off his finger. He offered to sell it for $10 to the next ten men that came in his shop. All of them refused and a couple even wanted to call a cop."

Montreal Star: A native Senegalese negro, Blaise Diagne, has been named under secretary of state for the colonies in the new French cabinet of Premier Laval. This is the first time in the history of the French republic that a negro has held cabinet rank. The nomination throws an interesting light on France's policy toward her African colonies. She confers equallity of citizenship nationals under her flag, and that citizenship is of France, not of Africa. Such a policy has been a tower of strength to the French in their work of pacific colonization, and this latest proof of its application in practice will tend still further to strengthen the bonds that bind the French colonies to La Patrie.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, NEB.
TELEGRAM
MAY 20 1931

* * *

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was presented a clock by subscribers. Was this a subtle hint to keep better time?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
MAY 18 1931

A DISHARMONIOUS NOTE came from across the seas a few days ago when the artistic temperament of Arturo Toscanini clashed with the patriotism of fascist youth. If Italy were at war, the conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra, for all his prominence, might have found himself in serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal anthem and the fascist hymn a place on the program of his native land.

It recalls the unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck who consented to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the war but observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances. It serves to show, too, how the least departure from the formalities of musical patriotism may be regarded by an aroused people.

It has been more or less accepted that Italians have a greater devotion to music for music's sake than Americans; yet here is evidence that their musical sensibilities would not prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscannini is said to be quilty and for which Dr. Muck was arrested. Since peace prevails, however, Toscannini's action and the face slapping's he suffered from fascist youth in Bologna ought to be no more than an 'incident' and, if the principals are wise, that is all they will allow it to be.

Conflicts between art and chauvinism can produce unfortunate results even in peace time and one between a great musical figure of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patroits as well as lovers of music would prefer to have forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN
MAY 22 1931

TOSCANINI HELD VIRTUAL PRISONER IN ITALY, BELIEF

Noted Orchestra Conductor's Passport Revoked by Police, Friends Say

Paris, May 22.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini, conducter of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home.

The friends said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and that he admitted that his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferreed to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that the night of the concert when he was attacked and severely pummelled by the enraged audience. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he did not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Tosanin's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Kousevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 22 1931

Tones And Semi-

By George R. Weintraub

[illegible]ght with perfect performances of popular classics and light music such as none but Arthur Fiedler can command. This consists of nearly 90 players. No other city this side of Europe produces this particular blend of delightful music and sociability, as the Pop goers sit around their tables at Sym- is the 46th season of the Pops, and follows upon the memorable 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which came to a close last month. The Pops orchestra phony hall with refreshments to touch off the evening.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum Concerts, the Esplanade Concerts (which he inaugurated), and his own Sinfonietta. The Pops have perhaps claimed the finest of his abilities.

A different program is offered each night. Next Sunday will be divided between Wagnerian excerpts and notable new music, such as Hansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique"—an outstanding achievement in symphonic jazz; also Chasins' "Parade," and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma as soloist. The Wagnerian selections include the Introduction to Act III from "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll from "Siegfried," Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

TOSCANINI HELD PRISONER IN HIS HOME AT MILAN

N. Y. Philharmonic Conductor's Passport Has Been Revoked

Paris, May 22—Friends of Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home.

The friends said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and that he admitted that his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that the night of the concert when he was attacked and severely pummelled by the enraged audience. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he did not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAY 18 1931

PAGE DR MUCK

Sig Arturo Toscanini can now sympathize with Dr Karl Muck, the one-time conductor of the famous old Boston Symphony orchestra. The distinguished Italian maestro was treated with inexcusable rudeness in Bologna when he refused to play the Fascist anthem. He did not consider it "good music." Of course Toscanini should have been a little more cautious. Perhaps, however, he felt that the people of Italy would take into consideration the fact that he is an Italian and a temperamental one, at that, with, of course, a lofty knowledge and appreciation of what really constitutes good music. But he failed to reckon with the temperament of the loyal Fascisti with the result that he was not only slapped, but ordered out of the city.

We see many persons turning up their noses and perhaps lifting their eyebrows eloquently over here at such treatment. But they might well recall, in this connection, the case of Dr Muck who as conductor of the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra was humiliated and roundly abused althought not actually assaulted because in Providence, R. I., he refused to play our own national anthem on the ground that it was not good music, or was not appropriate to the program which he was presenting, or something like that.

It will be recalled that the incident led to a bitter persecution or prosecution of Dr Muck that ended with his confinement in an interment camp and general execration. But that was in actual war time when we, in common with some of the other nations did a lot of flamboyantly foolish things. Which probably we would repeat under similar circumstances unless we remembered the propaganda that led to some of our inexcusable World war offenses.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

MAY 18 1931

Those who read of the demonstration in Bologna against the famous conductor, Arturo Toscanini, will be reminded of the fuss that was stirred up when the editor of a Providence paper demanded that Dr. Muck should lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in playing the Star Spangled Banner at a concert which had been arranged in that city during war time. This had never been the practice of the orchestra at its formal concerts. As a matter of fact, Dr. Muck was unfairly criticized in that respect. Subsequently at the request of the management he offered no objections to adding our national anthems to the programs. In Bologna Toscanini's objections to playing the Fascist national anthem appear to have been aesthetic. He did not believe that musically the composition was worthy of his attention. The expedient course, perhaps, would have been to concede something to a popular demand. But Toscanini has not been accustomed to submit to dictation in his artistic endeavors. There is the impression that by Premier Mussolini the incident at Bologna will be overlooked in view of the eminent position of the gifted conductor in the musical world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAY 19 1931

[illegible] the same good coal you
Now you can know, every what you are getting. You can [illegible]st anthracite ever brought a just as you buy all other ho
[illegible]eds of recognized merit—by n
[illegible]e choicest anthracite from P
[illegible]'s richest seams is now col
[illegible]less blue for your ready ide
Your guarantee of qualit
[illegible]l'... America's Finest Anthra cleaned, prepared, sized an [illegible]', blue coal' comes to you al
[illegible]e, always dependable, alway
[illegible]tisfactory fuel you ever bu

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

MAY 16 1931

Art for Art's Sake.

Arturo Toscanini, the eminent conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, has advanced a naive (but not novel) excuse for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at his concert in Bologna. He says that the anthem is not "good music." But surely the maestro realizes that few national anthems are. The "Star-Spangled Banner" is a musical mediocrity and "God Save the King" is wholly uninspired from the same point of view.

Nevertheless, if a national anthem is rarely good music, it is always good politics. Even in this free country Karl Muck, the German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought trouble upon himself by declining to play the "Star-Spangled Banner" in war time. It is easy to imagine how much more dangerous such a policy would be under the Fascist regime in Italy. Mussolini himself, while traveling incognito, is said to have been warned to rise as the Fascist anthem was played in a motion picture theater there. We suggest that hereafter Toscanini not only play the anthem, but conduct it with one hand raised in the Fascist salute.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
STATE JOURNAL

MAY 19 1931

When t tra was scribers, wise-crac dren's supper.

with fruits and hc
Make delicious
At grocers. Made in Battle Creek.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
EVE. STATE JOURNAL

MAY 20 1931

FOOTNOTES.

"If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land," says the Baltimore Sun. "The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who tho consenting to play 'The Star Spangled Banner' whenever he appeared with the Boston symphony orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

"Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STATE JOURNAL

good.

FOOTNOTES.

"If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land," says the Baltimore Sun. "The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who tho consenting to play 'The Star Spangled Banner' whenever he appeared with the Boston symphony orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

"Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short."

The weakest spot of all in our administration of justice is the impunity with which witnesses are allowed to commit perjury, writes Dorothy Dunbar Bromley in Harpers. She writes: "As distinguished from the rare witness who has high ethical standards, the average man on the stand feels no compulsion to tell the truth, first because his conscience makes no such demands upon him and, second, because he has been given no reason to fear that he will be punished if he swears falsely. In all probability he has never heard of anyone who has been arrested for committing perjury, and he may not even know that under the laws of most of our states the offense is a felony, punishable by a number of years in prison."

The trend of the times in New York is illustrated by this story. "Harry is a student of humanity, and he gets his philosophy out of crowds. Today he is obsessed with the idea that no one will take a risk, that everyone has become a conservative. To prove his point he took a $600 diamond ring off his finger. He offered to sell it for $10 to the next ten men that came in his shop. All of them refused and a couple even wanted to call a cop."

Montreal Star: A native Senegalese negro, Blaise Diagne, has been named under secretary of state for the colonies in the new French cabinet of Premier Laval. This is the first time in the history of the French republic that a negro has held cabinet rank. The nomination throws an interesting light on France's policy toward her African colonies. She confers equality of citizenship nationals under her flag, and that citizenship is of France, not of Africa. Such a policy has been a tower of strength to the French in their work of pacific colonization, and this latest proof of its application in practice will tend still further to strengthen the bonds that bind the French colonies to La Patrie.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, NEB.
TELEGRAM

MAY 20 1931

* * *

The conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was presented a clock by subscribers. Was this a subtle hint to keep better time?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

MAY 19 1931

Tennis Tourney

May 17 (AP).—The Cricket club today it would conduct a professional tennis featuring William Vincent Richards,

23 A
Triu

A DISPATCH from across the seas a few days ago told how when the artistic temperament of Arturo Toscanini clashed with the patriotism of fascist youth. If Italy were at war, the conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra, for all his prominence, might have found himself in serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal anthem and the fascist hymn a place on the program of his native land.

It recalls the unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck who consented to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the war but observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances. It serves to show, too, how the least departure from the formalities of musical patriotism may be regarded by an aroused people.

It has been more or less accepted that Italians have a greater devotion to music for music's sake than Americans; yet here is evidence that their musical sensibilities would not prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscannini is said to be guilty and for which Dr. Muck was arrested. Since peace prevails, however, Toscannini's action and the face slapping's he suffered from fascist youth in Bologna ought to be no more than an 'incident' and, if the principals are wise, that is all they will allow it to be.

Conflicts between art and chauvinism can produce unfortunate results even in peace time and one between a great musical figure of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patroits as well as lovers of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN

MA[illegible] 31

TOSCANINI HELD VIRTUAL PRISONER IN ITALY, BELIEF

Noted Orchestra Conductor's Passport Revoked by Police, Friends Say

Paris, May 22.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini, conducter of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home.

The friends said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and that he admitted that his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferreed to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that the night of the concert when he was attacked and severely pummelled by the enraged audience. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he did not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Tosanin's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Kousevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAY [illegible]

"Pops" Are Now in Full Swing at Symphony Hall.

It is the Pops only that keep Boston musical in May and June. The Pops, now in full sway at Symphony hall, are doing more than that. They are delighting crowds each night with perfect performances of popular classics and light music such as none but Arthur Fiedler can command. This consists of nearly 90 players. No other city this side of Europe produces this particular blend of delightful music and sociability, as the Pop goers sit around their tables at Symis the 46th season of the Pops, and follows upon the memorable 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which came to a close last month. The Pops orchestra phony hall with refreshments to touch off the evening.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum Concerts, the Esplanade Concerts (which he inaugurated), and his own Sinfonietta. The Pops have perhaps claimed the finest of his abilities.

A different program is offered each night. Next Sunday will be divided between Wagnerian excerpts and notable new music, such as Hansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique"—an outstanding achievement in symphonic jazz; also Chasins' "Parade," and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma as soloist. The Wagnerian selections include the Introduction to Act III from "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll from "Siegfried," Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

TOSCANINI HELD PRISONER IN HIS HOME AT MILAN

N. Y. Philharmonic Conductor's Passport Has Been Revoked

Paris, May 22—Friends of Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home.

The friends said they were able to speaker to the conductor over the telephone and that he admitted that his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that the night of the concert when he was attacked and severely pummelled by the enraged audience. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he did not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 22 1931

Toscanini Held in Milan, Passport Taken; Koussevitzky Cancels Contract in Protest

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES

PARIS, May 21.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him yesterday by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house.

The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor any one else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next forty-eight hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home.

Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the prefect.

However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Continued from Page One.

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ["Kill him!"] and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declare, there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

The French press, apparently so as not to rouse Italian susceptibilities, has thus far given not a single word of news of the incident.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told your correspondent today that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Toscanini's Friends Jailed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 21.—A special dispatch by the Ullstein News Agency from Milan reports that fourteen of the students who participated in a demonstration for Arturo Toscanini in the Scala Theatre are still being held. Many friends of the conductor who criticized his treatment have also been arrested.

Despite these measures, Signor Toscanini has received many letters of sympathy from within Italy.

"Discipline" Indicated.

ROME, May 21 (AP).—It was said on good authority here today that Arturo Toscanini possibly might be subjected to some "discipline" for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at Bologna last Thursday.

This was expected in circles close to official quarters to take the form of a temporary suspension of his passport as a sign of the government's disapproval of his action.

It was said that the passport probably would be restored soon and that the conductor would be free to leave Italy when he wished.

Koussevitzky Sailed May 6.

Mr. Koussevitzky left for Euro on May 6 at the conclusion of h seventh year as conductor of t Boston Symphony Orchestra a heard about the Toscanini incide when he arrived abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is stayi in Paris, has no other engagemen to conduct abroad, according to V H. Brennan, manager of the Bost Symphony, who expressed surpri yesterday in Boston at the condu tor's action, and said that he h heard nothing from him about it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

Toscanini Is Kept 'Prisoner' To Avoid Beating, He Phones

PARIS, May 22 (INS).—Friends of Arturo Toscanini conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home. They said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and he admitted his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini admitted he was not forced to remain in the house, but preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that on the night of the concert, when he was severely pummeled. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he id not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan, June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

anyone else seems to understand.

Detectives and soldiers are guarding Toscanini's home. Students who made a hostile demonstration outside the home cheered reports that the conductor's passport had been temporarily suspended.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had refused to conduct in th festival at Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Signor Tuscanini is scheduled to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement, but it seems entirely to de-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

AWAIT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOSCANINI CASE

By The Associated Press

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascists for refusing to play their anthem at a concert. Koussevitzky cancelled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAY 22 1931

As Friend of Toscanini, Boston Symphony Leader ~~Cancels~~ Milan Engagement

Koussevitsky Refuses to Conduct Festival ~~Because~~ Fellow Artist Is Held Virtual Prisoner After Beating for Failure to Play Fascist Anthem Last Week.

PARIS, May 22—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced his refusal to conduct durin the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the grou nd that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

Attacked and Beaten.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.

He cabled the Scala Theater tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" ologna le ar- will- olitics, s con- cabled ble to as in- of the with eason. for were t Mi- move bject t po- n the ment rities they l, al- ould had reat-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

MAY 22

Italy Holds Toscanini in Milan Home as Prisoner

Passport Taken From Conductor—Fascist Police and Soldiers Guard House

New York Times-Minneapolis Journal Cable

pend on the good will of the fascist olice.

The conductor admitted the treatent he had received in his own ountry since the affair at Bologna ad considerably affected his health nd nerves. He said, however, he as trying to keep his patience and emper and it is to avoid any demnstrations in the street, either in is favor or hostile, such as those t Bologna, that he is remaining at ome.—Copyright 1931.

ly affeced his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor, Minister of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

Cancels 2 Milan Concerts in Storm Over Toscanini

PARIS, May 22.—(I.N.S.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today canceled two programs arranged for the Milan musical festival as a protest against the beating of Arturo Toscanini by Fascist sympathizers. Koussevitzky protested to the festival manager against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

Garo photo.
Serge Koussevitsky.

Toscanini recently refused to play the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna. He was beaten. The following day his passport was revoked and he is being held a virtual prisoner in his home at Milan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN

MAY 23 1931

Editorial of the Day

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme volence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.—Baltimore Sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.

MAY 23 1931

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductr'os refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving any- of the right of a free conduct across where to have safe the frontier of his own country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 22 1931

Toscanini Held in Milan, Passport Taken; Koussevitzky Cancels Contract in Protest

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES

PARIS, May 21.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him yesterday by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house.

The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor any one else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next forty-eight hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home.

Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the prefect.

However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Continued from Page One.

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ["Kill him!"] and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declare, there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

The French press, apparently so as not to rouse Italian susceptibilities, has thus far given not a single word of news of the incident.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told your correspondent today that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Toscanini's Friends Jailed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 21.—A special dispatch by the Ullstein News Agency from Milan reports that fourteen of the students who participated in a demonstration for Arturo Toscanini in the Scala Theatre are still being held. Many friends of the conductor who criticized his treatment have also been arrested.

Despite these measures, Signor Toscanini has received many letters of sympathy from within Italy.

"Discipline" Indicated.

ROME, May 21 (Æ).—It was said on good authority here today that Arturo Toscanini possibly might be subjected to some "discipline" for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at Bologna last Thursday.

This was expected in circles close to official quarters to take the form of a temporary suspension of his passport as a sign of the government's disapproval of his action.

It was said that the passport probably would be restored soon and that the conductor would be free to leave Italy when he wished.

Koussevitzky Sailed May 6.

Mr. Koussevitzky left for Euro on May 6 at the conclusion of t seventh year as conductor of t Boston Symphony Orchestra a heard about the Toscanini incide when he arrived abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is stayi in Paris, has no other engagemen to conduct abroad, according to H. Brennan, manager of the Bost Symphony, who expressed surpri yesterday in Boston at the condu tor's action, and said that he ha heard nothing from him about it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

[illegible] we can save [illegible] he clothes we [illegible] cter of these [illegible] f fabric, their [illegible] needling, they [illegible] which for[illegible] said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and he admitted his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini admitted he was not forced to remain in the house, but preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that on the night of the concert, when he was severely pummeled. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he id not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

[illegible]

AWAIT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOSCANINI CASE

By The Associated Press

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascists for refusing to play their anthem at a concert. Koussevitzky cancelled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAY 22 1931

As Friend of Toscanini, Boston Symphony Leader Cancels Milan Engagement

Koussevitsky Refuses to Conduct Festival Because Fellow Artist Is Held Virtual Prisoner After Beating for Failure to Play Fascist Anthem Last Week.

PARIS, May 22—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced his refusal to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the ground that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

Attacked and Beaten.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.

He cabled the Scala Theater tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" [illegible] ologna [illegible] ble ar- [illegible] will- [illegible] olitics. [illegible] s con- [illegible] cabled [illegible] hle to [illegible] as in- [illegible] of the [illegible] with [illegible] pason. [illegible] for [illegible] were [illegible] t Mi- [illegible] nove- [illegible] bject [illegible] t po- [illegible] n the [illegible] ment [illegible] rities [illegible] they [illegible] l. al- [illegible] ould [illegible] had [illegible] reat- ly affected his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor. Ministe[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

MAY 22 [illegible]

Italy Holds Toscanini in Milan Home as Prisoner

Passport Taken From Conductor—Fascist Police and Soldiers Guard House

New York Times-Minneapolis Journal Cable

Paris, May 22.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house.

The police informed him the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Detectives and soldiers are guarding Toscanini's home. Students who made a hostile demonstration outside the home cheered reports that the conductor's passport had been temporarily suspended.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had refused to conduct in th festival at Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Signor Tuscanini is scheduled to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement, but it seems entirely to depend on the good will of the fascist police.

The conductor admitted the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, he was trying to keep his patience and temper and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home.—Copyright 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

[illegible]

Cancels 2 Milan Concerts in Storm Over Toscanini

PARIS, May 22.—(I.N.S.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today canceled two programs arranged for the Milan musical festival as a protest against the beating of Arturo Toscanini by Fascist sympathizers. Koussevitzky protested to the festival manager against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

Garo photo.
Serge Koussevitsky.

Toscanini recently refused to play the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna. He was beaten. The following day his passport was revoked and he is being held a virtual prisoner in his home at Milan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN

MAY 23 [illegible]

Editorial of the Day

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme volence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.—Baltimore Sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.

MAY 23 1931

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontier of his own country.

Private information which has

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 22 1931

Toscanini Held in Milan, Passport Taken; Koussevitzky Cancels Contract in Protest

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES

PARIS, May 21.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him yesterday by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house.

The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor any one else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next forty-eight hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home.

Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the prefect.

However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Continued from Page One.

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ["Kill him!"] and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declare, there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

The French press, apparently so as not to rouse Italian susceptibilities, has thus far given not a single word of news of the incident.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told your correspondent today that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Toscanini's Friends Jailed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 21.—A special dispatch by the Ullstein News Agency from Milan reports that fourteen of the students who participated in a demonstration for Arturo Toscanini in the Scala Theatre are still being held. Many friends of the conductor who criticized his treatment have also been arrested.

Despite these measures, Signor Toscanini has received many letters of sympathy from within Italy.

"Discipline" Indicated.

ROME, May 21 (Æ).—It was said on good authority here today that Arturo Toscanini possibly might be subjected to some "discipline" for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at Bologna last Thursday.

This was expected in circles close to official quarters to take the form of a temporary suspension of his passport as a sign of the government's disapproval of his action.

It was said that the passport probably would be restored soon and that the conductor would be free to leave Italy when he wished.

Koussevitzky Sailed May 6.

Mr. Koussevitzky left for Europe on May 6 at the conclusion of his seventh year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and heard about the Toscanini incident when he arrived abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is staying in Paris, has no other engagements to conduct abroad, according to V. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony, who expressed surprise yesterday in Boston at the conductor's action, and said that he had heard nothing from him about it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

Ital Pass
New Yo
Paris
Toscar
ephon and of that him he w his h
Th
port would be returned, was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Detectives and soldiers are guarding Toscanini's home. Students who made a hostile demonstration outside the home cheered reports that the conductor's passport had been temporarily suspended.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had refused to conduct in th festival at Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Signor Tuscanini is scheduled to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement, but it seems entirely to de-

HARDWARE
13 SO. 6th ST
At. 0515

FIRST GR
CHOICE OF 576
$4, $5 to $6

are we can save he clothes we cter of these f fabric, their needling, they

able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and he admitted his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini admitted he was not forced to remain in the house, but preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that on the night of the concert, when he was severely pummeled. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he id not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

MAY 23 1931

AWAIT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOSCANINI CASE

By The Associated Press

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascists for refusing to play their anthem at a concert. Koussevitzky cancelled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAY 22 1931

As Friend of Toscanini, Boston Symphony Leader ~~Cancels~~ Milan Engagement

Koussevitsky Refuses to Conduct Festival ~~Because~~ Fellow Artist Is Held Virtual Prisoner After Beating for Failure to Play Fascist Anthem Last Week.

PARIS, May 22—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced his refusal to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the ground that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

Attacked and Beaten.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.

He cabled the Scala Theater tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world, and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics, and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival, that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract.

Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini were able to reach him by telephone at Milan today and learned that his movements for the time being are subject entirely to the will of the Fascist police. He should leave Milan within the next 48 hours to keep an engagement at Vienna, but the Italian authorities had given no intimation that they would permi him to go, he said, although they told him that they would eventually return his passport.

He said that the treatment he had received in his own country had greatly affected his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor. Ministe[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

MAY 23 1931

Cancels 2 Milan Concerts in Storm Over Toscanini

PARIS, May 22.—(I.N.S.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today canceled two programs arranged for the Milan musical festival as a protest against the beating of Arturo Toscanini by Fascist sympathizers. Koussevitzky protested to the festival manager against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

Garo photo.
Serge Koussevitsky.

Toscanini recently refused to play the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna. He was beaten. The following day his passport was revoked and he is being held a virtual prisoner in his home at Milan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHVILLE, TENN.
TENNESSEAN

MAY 23 1931

Editorial of the Day

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme volence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.—Baltimore Sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.

MAY 23 1931

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductr'os refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depri[illegible] any of the right of a free conduct across where to have safe the frontier of his own country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 22 1931

Toscanini Held in Milan, Passport Taken; Koussevitzky Cancels Contract in Protest

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES

PARIS, May 21.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him yesterday by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house.

The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor any one else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next forty-eight hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home.

Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the prefect.

However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Continued from Page One.

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ["Kill him!"] and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declare, there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

The French press, apparently so as not to rouse Italian susceptibilities, has thus far given not a single word of news of the incident.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told your correspondent today that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Toscanini's Friends Jailed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, May 21.—A special dispatch by the Ullstein News Agency from Milan reports that fourteen of the students who participated in a demonstration for Arturo Toscanini in the Scala Theatre are still being held. Many friends of the conductor who criticized his treatment have also been arrested.

Despite these measures, Signor Toscanini has received many letters of sympathy from within Italy.

"Discipline" Indicated.

ROME, May 21 (Æ).—It was said on good authority here today that Arturo Toscanini possibly might be subjected to some "discipline" for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem at Bologna last Thursday.

This was expected in circles close to official quarters to take the form of a temporary suspension of his passport as a sign of the government's disapproval of his action.

It was said that the passport probably would be restored soon and that the conductor would be free to leave Italy when he wished.

Koussevitzky Sailed May 6.

Mr. Koussevitzky left for Euro on May 6 at the conclusion of h seventh year as conductor of t Boston Symphony Orchestra a heard about the Toscanini incide when he arrived abroad.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is stayi in Paris, has no other engagemen to conduct abroad, according to W H. Brennan, manager of the Bost Symphony, who expressed surpri yesterday in Boston at the condu tor's action, and said that he h heard nothing from him about it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

Ital

Pass

HARDWAR
13 SO. 6th ST
At. 0515

FIRST GR
CHOICE OF 576
$4, $5 to $6

are we can save he clothes we cter of these f fabric, their needling, they

New Yo
Pari
Toscar
ephon and o that him he w his h
Th
port would be returned,
was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Detectives and soldiers are guarding Toscanini's home. Students who made a hostile demonstration outside the home cheered reports that the conductor's passport had been temporarily suspended.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had refused to conduct in th festival at Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Signor Tuscanini is scheduled to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement, but it seems entirely to de-able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and he admitted his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini admitted he was not forced to remain in the house, but preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that on the night of the concert, when he was severely pummeled. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian officials was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he id not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVENING

AWAIT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOSCANINI CASE

By The Associated Press

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascists for refusing to play their anthem at a concert. Koussevitzky cancelled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

As Friend of Toscanini, Boston Symphony Leader Cancels Milan Engagement

Koussevitsky Refuses to Conduct Festival Because Fellow Artist Is Held Virtual Prisoner After Beating for Failure to Play Fascist Anthem Last Week.

PARIS, May 22—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday announced his refusal to conduct durin the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan from June 7 to 17 as a protest against the virtual imprisonment of Signor Arturo Toscanini at his home in Milan.

Signor Toscanini declined to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert at Bologna on May 15 on the ground that it would spoil the artistic effect of his concert.

Attacked and Beaten.

He was attacked and beaten by Fascists, his passport was taken from him, and in a telephone conversation today he admitted that he was a "voluntary" prisoner at his Milan home.

Koussevitzky, who is regarded as one of the foremost conductors in the world, had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Ravel, Roussel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven at Milan as a climax to the Italian season.

He cabled the Scala Theater tonight that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world, and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics, and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival, that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract.

Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini were able to reach him by telephone at Milan today and learned that his movements for the time being are subject entirely to the will of the Fascist police. He should leave Milan within the next 48 hours to keep an engagement at Vienna, but the Italian authorities had given no intimation that they would permi him to go, he said, although they told him that they would eventually return his passport.

He said that the treatment he had received in his own country had greatly affected his health and his nerves, but that he was trying to keep his temper. He is remaining in seclusion at home, he said, to avoid any street demonstrations, either hostile or in his favor, such as those at Bologna. His greatest concern is that his passport will not be returned and that he will be held a prisoner in his own country indefinitely, he said.

Private information regarding the Bologna incident clearly indicates that the prevention of his concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with Fascist leaders of the city.

He did not comment on the extent of the injuries which he had suffered at the hands of an angry mob of Fascists, and it was thought that they could not have been extensive, although it was reported from Bologna at the time that his arm had been injured to such an extent that he would not be able to conduct at Vienna.

The concert which caused the display was to have commemorated Giuseppe Martucci, famous composer and conductor. Minister of Communications Costanzo Ciano and Under Secretary of Interior Leondro Arpinati were present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

Cancels 2 Milan Concerts in Storm Over Toscanini

PARIS, May 22.—(I.N.S.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today canceled two programs arranged for the Milan musical festival as a protest against the beating of Arturo Toscanini by Fascist sympathizers. Koussevitzky protested to the festival manager against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

Garo photo.
Serge Koussevitsky.

Toscanini recently refused to play the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna. He was beaten. The following day his passport was revoked and he is being held a virtual prisoner in his home at Milan.

y

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme volence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.—Baltimore Sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
NEWPORT, R. I.
MAY 23 1931

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductr'os refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had been planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving any of the right of a free man to conduct across the frontier of his own country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MAY 23 1931

TOSCANINI IS NOT UNDER ARREST, IT IS NOW STATED

But Mussolini Discpilines Him for His Refusal to Play Facist Hymn

KOUSSEVITZKY ANGRY

Russian Refuses to Conduct Milan Festival Because of Incident

(Special to The New York Review.)

Milan, May 22.—That Toscanini has been arrested and his passport seized by orders of Premier Mussolini on the ground that his presence in Italy is a menace to peace and order was denied today. The famous conductor is allowed to remain at his home here under police observation. Whether he will be allowed to leave for Vienna tomorrow to conduct a concert there, the authorities will not say.

Except for Toscanini's refusal to play the Facist hymn at the concert in Bologna and the resulting riot when he appeared on the street, his friends say there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Twenty persons were arrested this week at a concert at the Scala Opera House for demonstrations in favor of Toscanini.

Shouting "Long live Toscanini," a number of persons in the audience interrupted the first number of the concert, which was being directed by the Dutch conductor, Albert Van Raalte. Signor Toscanini had spent a large part of his professional life on the Scala stage.

Theatre attendants and carabineers halted the demonstrations, but made no arrests during the concert. They quietly noted the offenders, however, and took them into custody as they left the theatre after the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATI, O.

POST

MAY 23 1931

RESENTS TREATMENT

Orchestra Leader May Appear Despite Toscanini Incident

By United Press.

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, may consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had canceled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAY 23 1931

Toscanini Plans To Conduct at Bayreuth in July

Sends Word He Is Recovering From Fascist Injuries; Cancels Vienna Dates

Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York and chief conductor of the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth, is recovering from injuries inflicted by Fascists in Bologna, Italy, when he refused to start a concert with the Fascist hymn, "Giovanezza," and, according to a cable message received yesterday in this city, will be able to conduct at Bayreuth in July and August, though his engagement to direct two symphony concerts in Vienna next week had to be canceled.

"I am tranquil," ran the message, which was received by his American secretary, Bruno Zirato. "I am not going to Vienna, but I shall be in Bayreuth as scheduled. Thank all my friends for their kind greetings to me."

The message was sent from Milan, Mr. Toscanini's home, to which he was ordered by Fascist officials in Bologna after the attack on him by a mob of Fascist youths May 14. Following his arrival in Milan there was a demonstration in his behalf which interrupted a concert at La Scala Opera House and resulted in the arrest of a score of the demonstrants.

Mr. Toscanini had expected to be in Vienna Tuesday to start rehearsals for his two concerts there, one of which was to have been given today and the other Monday. At Bayreuth he is to conduct five performances of "Parsifal" and five performances of "Tannhaeuser," the first to be given July 21 and the last, August 19.

At the time of the attack on him in Bologna he was conducting the first of two concerts in memory of the Italian composer Giuseppe Martucci, an associate of Mr. Toscanini in the latter's earlier career.

Two Soldiers Guard His Home

MILAN, Italy, May 22 (AP).—Two soldiers and a half dozen detectives have been posted as a guard outside the home of Arturo Toscanini. Last night a group of students staged a hostile demonstration outside the house, cheering the news that Toscanini's passport had been suspended temporarily by the government. It is expected that the suspension will be lifted in a day or two.

Kousseritzky Indignant

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

Copyright, 1931, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, May 22.—Strong representations are being made from Milan to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he reconsider his decision to cancel his engagement for the La Scala June festival there, it was learned here today. He broke the contract as a protest against the treatment of Arturo Toscanini.

"The slap in the face which Toscanini received at Bologna was an insult not only to him but to artists generally," Koussevitzky said to this correspondent today. "I have been asked several times by the management of La Scala to rescind my cancelation, but for the present I shall take no action in that direction pending further developments."

Koussevitzky said he had not heard that Toscanini's passport had been taken away and that he was unable to leave Italy. It is affirmed in anti-Fascist quarters that not only has the passport been taken but that Toscanini is followed by agents of the Fascist secret service whenever he leaves his home at Milan. They profess to be unable to advance reasons why such action should be taken.

Officials attached to the Italian Embassy here scout the idea that Toscanini has been in any way embarrassed by the Italian government. No word to that effect, they say, has been received.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ALBANY, N. Y.

NEWS

1931

CONDUCTOR DELAYS TOSCANINI DECISION

PARIS, May 23 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at the Scala in Milan.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

23 1931

Koussevitzky's Protest

It is long since music has been dragged into world politics as now threatens to result from the Fascist persecution of Toscanini for his refusal to open an operatic performance with the Fascist national anthem.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and an uncompromising foe of tyranny, has already made protest by canceling his engagement to conduct two performances of the great festival to be held at the Scala theater in Milan from June 7 to 17. In a cable dispatch he told the managers that the "unbelievable outrage" against Toscanini at Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world, and that, being unwilling to associate music with politics, he was obliged to renounce his contract. To the reply from the Scala that it was impossible to cancel the festival and that there was no sufficient reason for a breach of the contract he replied: "It is a question of principle 'with me and that is sufficient rea-'son."

American opinion will give him hearty support, but how many Americans remember the case of Dr Karl Muck? That distinguished German conductor, who gave the Boston Symphony orchestra an artistic standing not inferior to that attained under Dr Koussevitzky, was subjected to much the same treatment as Toscanini, when an excited patriotic crowd at Providence demanded that he open a symphony program with "The Star-Spangled 'Banner." His refusal, like Toscanini's, was on purely artistic grounds but the mob spirit cared nothing for art, and while Dr Muck was not, like Toscanini, beaten with clubs, he was mercilessly treated and finally sent to a detention camp.

That was in wartime, to be sure, an excuse which Bologna lacks, but in war or peace this kind of rancorous intolerance is nothing to be proud of, and in applauding Dr Koussevitzky's prompt and emphatic protest we need not be too scornful of Bologna. The essential thing is to resist as he has done efforts to drag the arts into politics.

Of all the arts music is, or should be, the most universal, the most free from political entanglements, and even in the darkest days of the war when the whole world was more or less crazy it was not often that a hearing was denied to great masterpieces because of the nationality of the composer.

Italy is surpassed by no country in its services to music; it would be a pity for it now to go over to the side of the Philistines. Dr Koussevitzky's protest will certainly be applauded by many Italians of culture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK

SUN

1931

SCALA CONTRACT WAITS

Conductor Balks, as Gesture for Toscanini.

PARIS, May 23 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at La Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascisti for refusing to play their anthem at a concert. Koussevitzky cancelled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. JOURNAL

MAY 23 1931

DENY TOSCANINI USE OF CABLE

PARIS, May 23.—Indications that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, is being subjected to harsh methods of discipline by Fascist authorities became even plainer today.

Toscanini, who was beaten by Fascists when he refused to conduct an orchestra playing the Fascist national hymn in Bologna last week, is reported to be a virtual prisoner in his Milan residence.

Advices from New York state that the conductor has not answered many cabled messages. It is believed that authorities will not permit him to respond.

Friends here say Toscanini has telephoned them that without his passport he will have to remain in Milan as long as authorities wish to detain him. This method of discipline has been employed before by Fascists, it is stated here.

Protesting against the treatment of Toscanini, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he has cancelled two programs arranged for the Milan music festival in June.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

HARTFORD, CONN.

TIMES

MILAN IGNORES PROTEST, WANTS KOUSSEVITZKY

Paris, May 23.—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, may yet consent to appear at the Scala opera house in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had cancelled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said to-day, before making a definite decision. The scala management, it was said, had urged him to rescind his cancellation of the engagement.

The Italian embassy here discounted a report that Toscanini's passport had been withdrawn because he refused to play the fascist and national anthems at a Milan concert appearance. Embassy officials said they would certainly be informed of such action if it were true.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK NEWS

ITALIAN FESTIVAL UP IN AIR OVER BEATEN TOSCANINI

Paris, May 23 (AP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by the Paris Herald today as saying he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan.

Signor Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philarmonic, has been deprived of his passport by the Italian Government as a result of the incident at Bologna in which he was pummeled by Fascists for refusing to play their anthem at a concert.

Koussevitsky canceled his Scala contract as a sympathy gesture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TIMES

MAY

PARIS, May 23 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was quoted by The Paris Herald today as saying that he was awaiting further developments in the case of Arturo Toscanini before reconsidering his decision not to conduct the June festival at Scala in Milan. Mr. Koussevitzky canceled his Scala contract as a jesture of sympathy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

UNION

MAY 23 1931

Temper and Temperaments

This is May. The weather is improving and temperatures and temperaments are rising, particularly the latter. In Bologna, Italy, scarce ten days ago Fascisti temperament often near the boiling point, collided with artistic temperament in the person of Arturo Toscanini, world famous orchestral conductor, with the result that the great maestro suffered in his dignity, in his person and in his peace of mind. For persisting in his refusal to play the royal march or the Fascist national hymn at the opening of a concert in that city on the ground that they would spoil the artistic effect of the concert he was slapped in the face by impetuous young Fascisti and afterward banished from the city by a high Fascist official.

Since then the musical world has been seething over the indignity. As striking evidence that temperaments have reached a record-breaking high, the noted Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and scarcely less celebrated than Toscanini himself, has canceled his engagement to conduct the forthcoming music festival at La Scala Theater in Milan, in protest against what he terms an "unbelievable outrage" and "an offense against the whole artistic world."

Meanwhile Fascisti temperament is losing none of its heat. At his home in Milan Toscanini, his movements said to be somewhat hampered by police surveillance, has informed friends that he is trying to keep his temper but his nerves and his health have been greatly affected by his treatment at Bologna and by the fact that he has been temporarily denived of his passport, which makes him a virtual prisoner.

The Fascisti manifestly are not trying to keep their temper, as evidenced by the suspension of Toscanini's passport, a gesture of the government obviously intended to appease the wrath of the black shirts. Even as a gesture, however, it seems to be unwise, uncalled for and likely to create more sympathy for Toscanini and less respect for the Fascist government.

In America, at least, there is a general feeling that Toscanini has already been punished enough, if not, indeed, too much, for his defiance of the musical predilections of the Bologna Fascisti. Also it would seem that Premier Mussolini and the Italian government have many other and more important matters to occupy their time and thought than the infliction of a further and unnecessary humiliation upon their country's most distinguished orchestral conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NEWS

MAY 1 1931

4 New Recordings Bring Symphonic and Solo Works

Modern Orchestration, Unusual Symphony Among Recent Victor Releases

"PICTURES AT AN EXHIBITION," Moussorgsky - Ravel. Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. Victor 8S.

This is one of the most fascinating and unusual recordings of the season. The composition was originally for the piano, but in that form it was too pregnant with musical possibilities for a single instrument. Ravel, in transcribing the number, revealed more than ever his genius for orchestration. Moussorgsky is religiously followed, not one phrase has been changed or interpolated, but an amazingly brilliant richness has been added.

A number of paintings, by a friend, on exhibition, are described in the tonal medium of music. Between the descriptions there runs the "promenade" theme, which is variated to indicate the nature of the next canvas. A good example of caricature in music is found in the sketch, "Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle"; and interpretative humor in the "Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens." This is certainly one of Moussorgsky's cleverest compositions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitsky reveals remarkable plasticity in a colorful variety of mood. The performance is a good one and the recording well done.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
MAY 17 1931

Music and Musicians

THE Boston Symphony orchestra spent most of last winter celebrating its 50th anniversary. All sorts and conditions of composers spoiled pages and pages of good score paper in honor of the event and some almost important music was composed. Stravinsky, of course, led the procession with his symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization. Mr. Koussevitzy, who surely loves us New Yorkers as we love him, permitted us to hear several of the compositions made for the prolonged festival. Some of them we shall probably hear again and others we shall not.

One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. The work is not entirely new; but this edition has been revised and brought up to date. It is naturally a vital contribution to the musical history of this country. Its pages teem with interesting matter about the distinguished founder of the orchestra and the various conductors who have presided over its artistic activities. Not the least sympathetic portion is that dealing with the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henschel after 50 years.

Henschel was the first wielder of its baton and it was a happy fortune that at 80 years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, making but one change in it. Not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present. But there was the old conductor, still a great musician and an object of veneration to Boston's army of concert devotees.

There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given to them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the east fill the stage of Carnegie hall.

◈ ◈ ◈

New York Sits Up

There was real excitement in the old Steinway hall down in 14th st., when the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke, of whom perhaps more may be said later. The opening number was the "Oberon" overture. At its close there was an outburst of cheering. The triumph was due chiefly to the splendid body of strings, which proclaimed the richness of the finale with an effect greatly heightened by the peculiarly brilliant and sonorous acoustics of the old hall.

There was some hesitation in the critical comments of the following day, but the consensus of opinion disclosed a feeling that there was going to be a revision of local orchestral standards. The suggestion that the wood winds of the orchestra were not up to the level of the strings was accepted by Mr. Gericke in good part. He brought from the Paris Opera Comique for the next season a new flute and a new oboe who worked a beneficial change in the wood section. To keep up with a string body headed by Franz Kneisel and Charles Martin Loeffler was not an easy matter.

There was an impression at the time that the audience in Steinway hall consisted largely, if not altogether, of Bostonians. This is an exaggeration. Of course, Massachusetts was well represented, but the music lovers of this village were very curious about the invaders. The cheering in the rear of the hall after the overture was led by a short man with bushy hair and a stubby mustache, who leaped upon his chair and shouted lustily. His name was Raphael Joseffy.

There is not much cheering at Boston concerts now, but the behavior of the box office is worth a thousand shouts. The period of artistic depression which came with the war is long past and the orchestra has risen to an imposing level. Present holders of seats may not recall clearly the troubles of the war days which are recounted admirably by Mr. Howe. All the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than 30 new men were engaged. The ensemble was disrupted and in fact a new machine had to be put together. And at the same moment the salary question obtruded itself and the orchestra threatened a strike. The victim of these circumstances was Pierre Monteux. This music lover never was convinced that M. Monteux was a great conductor; but that he was a good drill master and a competent executive could never be doubted. He faced his troubles courageously and by dint of hard and intelligent labor succeeded in restoring the orchestra to something like its former excellence. Certainly he should have the credit of leaving to Mr. Koussevitzky the well-tuned instrument upon which he now performs symphonic music with such skill.

◈ ◈ ◈

Founded By Col. Henry L. Higginson

There is much in the book about Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Colonel Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Colonel Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music. He set out to rear an edifice more lasting than brick or stone, and whether music as we now know it must succumb to the influence of the machine or the newly-developed taste which prefers nervous shocks to serene contemplation, the history of the Boston orchestra will endure as a demonstration of the fact that out of a race of barbarians, as seen by G. K. Chesterton, there came at least one man with a devotion to the loftiest artistic ideals.

Colonel Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. Naturally, he did not act without consulting others, but he moved in the end with decision, though with caution. That he was not always fortunate cannot be denied. Mr. Howe has been lenient in his treatment of some of the conductors, undoubtedly because he recognized the fact that not one of them was without some individual merit. But there were certain generals of the little army who were almost in the rough rider class.

The writer journeyed to Boston to be present at the debut of one of them. The first number on the program was Beethoven's fifth symphony. The conductor caused the introductory measures which publish the principal theme to be played violently and with long holds on the final tone. Those measures revealed completely the character of the conductor and the style which was to be expected from him at all times. When the intermission was reached and many of us moved out into the corridor to meet acquaintances, Ben Woolf, composer and critic, came up smiling and remarked: "Well, tonight Fate kicked the door clear in." But Colonel Higginson gave us Gericke, Nikisch and Muck. He died before Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky.

◈ ◈ ◈

A Truly Great Orchestra

Mr. Howe has placed the musical world under a debt of gratitude by bringing his work up to date. Boston has always held a peculiarly influential position in the center of musical activities in this country. The city is not now and never was an operatic community. Boston's musical culture has radiated from the symphony concerts and has enjoyed the benefit of a sound basis. There has been very little scope for sensationalism, even if there had been a desire for it. There has been even less in recent years since the appearance of soloists has been made rare. The orchestra is Boston's own splendid virtuoso and upon the beauty and eloquence of its playing the city depends for its most intense musical enjoyment.

The writer has frequently been asked if the Boston organization was not the best in the country. The answer is that he does not know and would not tell if he did. It is a bad American habit to ask who is the best singer, violinist, pianist or actor and then refuse to support any other. As far as the Boston orchestra is concerned it should be enough for any one of us to be convinced that it is without a superior. That we may venture to say, although we have not recently heard the Chicago ensemble. The substantial fact is that this is a great orchestra conducted with enthusiasm and brilliant musicianship by one of the foremost conductors of this time.

The Bostonians will next season begin their second half century. May they be as successful at its conclusion as they are now.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAY 24 1931

GRIFFES RECALLED

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

120 Park Avenue, Portland, Me.

Lawrence Gilman, Musical Editor,
New York Herald Tribune.
Dear Sir:

I would like to ask you a few questions about Charles T. Griffes. Did he ever write a symphonic work? . . . Maybe you can give me a few pointers. Do you know of any books I may get upon his life and works?

Thank you.

ROGER S. WOOD.

* * *

IT IS more than a decade since Charles T. Griffes, whose untimely death at thirty-six was so depleting a loss to American music, "paid his last tribute to Nature." There is, Mr. Wood, no book about Griffes; but some may find heartenment in the fact that interest in his music has not flagged. The letter of our correspondent is indicative; and only the other day, in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky stirred his hearers at Symphony Hall by his revival of Griffes' most consequential work, the symphonic poem suggested by verses from the gorgeous fantasy of Coleridge. "At the end of the performance," remarked the sensitive and exacting Mr. Parker in the "Transcript," "its place in the music of American composers was renewed and reassured. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poetry in which it is meager."

* * *

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (as Griffes called his tone-poem) was composed in 1916. When it was revived at Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky on April 24 last, it was played from a "new edition" prepared by Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra—another evidence of the abiding interest in Griffes and his music.

"I performed this work in Chicago," wrote Mr. Stock in an explanatory note, "in Jauary, 1920. In the autumn of that year, I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber-music at Pittsfield in Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together. The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version (published since Griffes' death). Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will 'sound' more readily, and present this very fine work to its best advantage."

Mr. Stock's reference to a meeting with Griffes "in the autumn of that year"—1920—is evidently a slip of the pen, since Griffes died on April 8, 1920.

* * *

An Artist Misused

ONE has noted before that Griffes had a delicate perception of mortal ironies, both humorous and tragical. He was a poet with a sense of comedy. And he was that most infrequent of miracles, an artist who sincerely undervalued his own contributions to the cosmos. Those who knew him will remember his casual attitude toward his work. Nor was this self-depreciation a pose. Griffes had never learned how to pose—one feels sure that he would never have learned how, if he had lived to be as triumphantly old and famous as Saint-Saëns or Bruch or Verdi. One imagines that Griffes would have been profoundly astonished if he could have witnessed the flood of appreciative tributes unloosed by his death. And it is possible that his astonishment might have been tinged with that gentle irony which never deserted him for long. For though the remarkable work that he was doing had won, while he was still alive, the recognition of a few among that "acute and honorable minority" whose approval is all that a genuinely fine-grained artist really cares about, it is deplorably true that Griffes had due. knack is gift nd a ntry's was vities outh- eauty r, or short the and its ex- an ap- poetry his later use.

* * *

An Emerging Personality

FRANCIS THOMPSON in his incomparable essay on Shelley wrote with savage bitterness of those who supposed that Shelley might have found consolation for his neglect in "that senseless superstition, the applause of posterity. Posterity, posterity! which goes to Rome, weeps large-sized tears, carves beautiful inscriptions over the tomb of Keats; and the worm must wriggle her curt say to it all, since the dead boy, wherever he be, has quite other gear to tend." A poet, said Thompson, "must to some extent be a chameleon, and feed on air. But it need not be the musty breath of the multitude. He can find his needful support in the judgment of those whose judgment he knows valuable."

Not many who have listened to "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and to Griffes' later works will fail to recognize the quality of this music. How truly imaginative is the opening of "Kubla Khan"—that "vague, foggy beginning" which (as he said) "describes the sacred river, running 'through caverns measureless to man down to a sunless sea.'" The music of this section, of the whole of the symphonic poem, indeed, has a richness of fantasy, an individuality of feeling, which, even when it reminds us of the work of other men, yet contributes something of its own to the discourse: something self-sprung and integrative. Griffes had not yet found himself: his derivations are obvious; but behind and beneath those derivations was an emerging personality.

* * *

Broken Airs

HE WAS A fastidious craftsman, a scrupulous artist. He was neither smug nor pretentious nor accommodating. He went his own way, modestly, quietly, unswervingly. Having the vision of the few, he had treasured, perhaps, that discourse of Plato's upon Beauty: "It is not like any face or hands or bodily thing; it is not in something else, neither living thing, nor earth nor heaven; only by itself in its own way, in one form, it forever is."

That conviction may have sustained him in more than one downcast hour. It cannot equally solace us; for we remember that the gift of eloquent and salient speech is an unpredictable event, obeying that baffling law of rhythmical occurrence whose comprehension, declares the subtlest of modern essayists, we may not know; for it flits upon an orbit that is mysteriously curved, keeping no man knows what tryst with time.

Listening to the music that he has left us, we can only say, as it was said in other years and to another memory: "Here are the broken airs that once you loved. They are but the breath of what has been: only are they for this, that they do the will of beauty and regret."

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
MAY 17 1931

Hunger for Orchestra Music Not So Pressing as Supposed

Fewer Concerts Given in New York—Boston Anniversary Event of Season

BY L. R. BOALS

The early part of the month of May brings to a close the musical season, at least, in the eastern part of the country. The opera season, the symphony concerts and all concerts of major importance are things of the past, temporarily, by the middle of May. The musical staticians sum up the year and publish their columns of figures. Those figures, incidentally, show that considerably fewer concerts were given in New York this year than have been given for a considerable number of years past.

The last season has marked the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that famous organization celebrated the event more or less, throughout the season. One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. The work is not entirely new, but has been revised and brought up to date.

There is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and supported it throughout his lifetime. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Colonel Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. Colonel Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music and took delight in giving his community the advantage of hearing the best.

Wrecked by War

Before the war it was pretty generally conceded that the Boston orchestra was the best organization of its kind in this country. The war just about wrecked it. Its conductor, Karl Muck, was interned, if I remember correctly, and all the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than 30 new men were engaged. Anyone at all familiar with the fine teamwork necessary in a really great orchestra knows what that change would do to such an organization. And on top of that came salary troubles and a threatened strike. It took years and several conductors to get the orchestra back to its old place among the three or four greatest.

One of the interesting events of the anniversary season was the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henshel after 50 years. Henshel was the first conductor of the orchestra and it was fortunate that at 80 years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, with but one change in it. Of course, not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction, and only two were able to be present.

The orchestra's programs, in all probability, were not on a par with those of past seasons. The conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, had invited compositions in commemoration of the anniversary, and would feel bound to play any of them that had any merit at all. It would be interesting to know just how much good score paper was ruined because of that invitation. Outstanding among the new compositions is said to be Stravinsky's symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization.

Set Standard for Orchestrs

The high standard of this orchestra when it was but six years old seems to have had beneficial effect on the orchestras of New York. Writing of its first visit to the metropolis, Mr. Henderson, of the Sun, says: "There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the East fill the stage of Carnegie Hall.

"There was real excitement in the old Steinway Hall down in Fourteenth St. when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gaves its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke. . . . The opening number was the 'Oberon' overture. At its close there was an outburst of cheering. The triumph was due chiefly to the splendid body of strings, which proclaimed the richness of the finale with an effect greatly heightened by the peculiarly brilliant and sonorous acoustics of the old hall.

"There was some hesitation in the critical comments of the following day, but the concensus disclosed a feeling that there was going to be a revision of local orchestras standards. The suggestion that the wood winds of the orchestra were not up to the level of the strings was accepted by Mr. Gericke in good part. He brought from the Paris Opera Comique for the next season a new flute and a new oboe who worked a beneficial change in the wood section. To keep up with a string section headed by Franz Kneisel and Charles Martin Loeffler was not an easy matter."

Probably cheering is not often, if ever, heard at present day concerts of the Boston orchestra; But continuously sold out houses are much more cheering than many shouts.

Many Orchestras Fail

The fact that the New York Philharmonic Symphony concerts and those of the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras, given in New York, are always sold out leads individuals and organizations into costly errors. Almost every season new orchestras are organized in New York to meet the crying want of good orchestral music for the mighty army of the hungry ones who cannot procure seats for the Philharmonic, Philadelphia, or Boston orchestras. For a number of years past a succession of orchestras has moved across th

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
MAY 17 1931

Music and Musicians

THE Boston Symphony orchestra spent most of last winter celebrating its 50th anniversary. All sorts and conditions of composers spoiled pages and pages of good score paper in honor of the event and some almost important music was composed. Stravinsky, of course, led the procession with his symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization. Mr. Koussevitzy, who surely loves us New Yorkers as we love him, permitted us to hear several of the compositions made for the prolonged festival. Some of them we shall probably hear again and others we shall not.

One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. The work is not entirely new; but this edition has been revised and brought up to date. It is naturally a vital contribution to the musical history of this country. Its pages teem with interesting matter about the distinguished founder of the orchestra and the various conductors who have presided over its artistic activities. Not the least sympathetic portion is that dealing with the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henschel after 50 years.

Henschel was the first wielder of its baton and it was a happy fortune that at 80 years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, making but one change in it. Not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction and only two were able to be present. But there was the old conductor, still a great musician and an object of veneration to Boston's army of concert devotees.

There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given to them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the east fill the stage of Carnegie hall.

◈ ◈ ◈

New York Sits Up

There was real excitement in the old Steinway hall down in 14th st., when the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke, of whom perhaps more time that the audience in Steinway hall consisted largely, if not altogether, of Bostonians. This is an exaggeration. Of course, Massachusetts was well represented, but the music lovers of this village were very curious about the invaders. The cheering in the rear of the hall after the overture was led by a short man with bushy hair and a stubby mustache, who leaped upon his chair and shouted lustily. His name was Raphael Joseffy.

There is not much cheering at Boston concerts now, but the behavior of the box office is worth a thousand shouts. The period of artistic depression which came with the war is long past and the orchestra has risen to an imposing level. Present holders of seats may not recall clearly the troubles of the war days which are recounted admirably by Mr. Howe. All the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than 30 new men were engaged. The ensemble was disrupted and in fact a new machine had to be put together. And at the same moment the salary question obtruded itself and the orchestra threatened a strike. The victim of these circumstances was Pierre Monteux. This music lover never was convinced that M. Monteux was a great conductor; but that he was a good drill master and a competent executive could never be doubted. He faced his troubles courageously and by dint of hard and intelligent labor succeeded in restoring the orchestra to something like its former excellence. Certainly he should have the credit of leaving to Mr. Koussevitzky the well-tuned instrument upon which he now performs symphonic music with such skill.

◈ ◈ ◈

Founded By Col. Henry L. Higginson

There is much in the book about Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Colonel Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. There was no pose in his attitude as the creator of a noble musical instrument. Colonel Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music. He set out to rear an edifice more lasting than brick or stone, and whether music as we now know it must succumb to the influence of the machine or the newly-developed taste which prefers nervous shocks to serene contemplation, the history of the Boston orchestra will endure as a demonstration of the fact that out of a race of barbarians, as seen by G. K. Chesterton, there came at least one man with a devotion to the loftiest artistic ideals.

Colonel Higginson exercised the most scrupulous care in selecting conductors for the orchestra. Naturally, he did not act without consulting others, but he moved in the and with decision though with cau- camera caperings and director's di- rections being nothing new to him.

In direct contrast to Cooper is the acting of little five-year-old Bobbie Coogan, who did not want to be in the picture at all. His inexperience and the coaching of the director are apparent in his every move, but he acts charmingly and you'll be falling blind-made brooms in Cuyahoga county in which officials hope to beat a record set last year when 20,000 brooms were sold for the Society for the Blind.

...ers In City

Scouts will receive a commission for broom sales to be credited to their summer camping account. Last year many scouts earned their tuition for two weeks' stay at camp while others piled up enough sales to assist less fortunate boys to a vacation at the Chagrin Falls scout reservation. Forty-two thousand brooms have been sold in the three previous campaigns.

The sale is an annual affair to keep the blind employees of the welfare organization's broom shop employed through the normally slack summer months. Twenty-five blind men are now employed getting ready for the influx of orders which ...

Clever Con... Proves Rea...

Her Actor Father Proud... Daughter's Salary Co...

DICK BENNETT tells with no small paternal pride of the fast deal put over on the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAY 24 1931

GRIFFES RECALLED

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

120 Park Avenue, Portland, Me.

Lawrence Gilman, Musical Editor,
New York Herald Tribune.
Dear Sir:

I would like to ask you a few questions about Charles T. Griffes. Did he ever write a symphonic work? . . . Maybe you can give me a few pointers. Do you know of any books I may get upon his life and works?

Thank you.

ROGER S. WOOD.

* * *

IT IS more than a decade since Charles T. Griffes, whose untimely death at thirty-six was so depleting a loss to American music, "paid his last tribute to Nature." There is, Mr. Wood, no book about Griffes; but some may find heartenment in the fact that interest in his music has not flagged. The letter of our correspondent is indicative; and only the other day, in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky stirred his hearers at Symphony Hall by his revival of Griffes' most consequential work, the symphonic poem suggested by verses from the gorgeous fantasy of Coleridge. "At the end of the performance," remarked the sensitive and exacting Mr. Parker in the "Transcript," "its place in the music of American composers was renewed and reassured. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poetry in which it is meager."

* * *

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (as Griffes called his tone-poem) was composed in 1916. When it was revived at Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky on April 24 last, it was played from a "new edition" prepared by Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra—another evidence of the abiding interest in Griffes and his music.

"I performed this work in Chicago," wrote Mr. Stock in an explanatory note, "in Jauary, 1920. In the autumn of that year, I had an opportunity of meeting Mr. Griffes during a festival of chamber-music at Pittsfield in Massachusetts, when I suggested to him that the scoring of his work, in some places, could be improved upon. This he readily admitted, and we arranged to meet again in order to go over the score together. The results of this very careful scrutiny are faithfully embodied in this revised version (published since Griffes' death). Nothing has been added that would not have been sanctioned by the composer. I have no doubt that with these changes and amplifications the orchestration will 'sound' more readily, and present this very fine work to its best advantage."

Mr. Stock's reference to a meeting with Griffes "in the autumn of that year"—1920—is evidently a slip of the pen, since Griffes died on April 8, 1920.

* * *

An Artist Misused

ONE has noted before that Griffes had a delicate perception of mortal ironies, both humorous and tragical. He was a poet with a sense of comedy. And he was that most infrequent of miracles, an artist who sincerely undervalued his own contributions to the cosmos. Those who knew him will remember his casual attitude toward his work. Nor was this self-depreciation a pose. Griffes had never learned how to pose—one feels sure that he would never have learned how, if he had lived to be as triumphantly old and famous as Saint-Saëns or Bruch or Verdi. One imagines that Griffes would have been profoundly astonished if he could have witnessed the flood of appreciative tributes unloosed by his death. And it is possible that his astonishment might have been tinged with that gentle irony which never deserted him for long. For though the remarkable work that he was doing had won, while he was still alive, the recognition of a few among that "acute and honorable minority" whose approval is all that a genuinely fine-grained artist really cares about, it is deplorably true that Griffes had scarcely begun to reap the reward, spiritual or material, that was his due.

Had he been endowed with the priceless instinct for publicity—that knack of tempting the shy radiance of the limelight which is God's most precious gift to the American genius—he might perhaps have won an encouragement and a leisure that would have resulted in an extensive contribution to his country's art. But he lacked that excellent and indispensable trait, and so he was obliged to divert the greater part of his time and his energy to activities that were merely utilitarian and sustaining. He must needs instruct youthful mediocrity to afflict the world, while those subtle fantasies of beauty that haunted his imagination were set aside for a more propitious hour, or became, it might be, fugitive and irrecoverable.

And so he went on to his piteously premature end. It was only a short while before his death that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time (November 28, 1919) his "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," and the general concert-going public turned aside for a moment from its excited twitterings over the canny exhibitionists of music to bestow an approving hand upon this producer of a sensitive and imaginative tone-poetry who was, by some mysterious accident, an American. A few months later Griffes was dead, worn out by drudgery and a stupid world's misuse.

* * *

An Emerging Personality

FRANCIS THOMPSON in his incomparable essay on Shelley wrote with savage bitterness of those who supposed that Shelley might have found consolation for his neglect in "that senseless superstition, the applause of posterity. Posterity, posterity! which goes to Rome, weeps large-sized tears, carves beautiful inscriptions over the tomb of Keats; and the worm must wriggle her curt say to it all, since the dead boy, wherever he be, has quite other gear to tend." A poet, said Thompson, "must to some extent be a chameleon, and feed on air. But it need not be the musty breath of the multitude. He can find his needful support in the judgment of those whose judgment he knows valuable."

Not many who have listened to "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and to Griffes' later works will fail to recognize the quality of this music. How truly imaginative is the opening of "Kubla Khan"—that "vague, foggy beginning" which (as he said) "describes the sacred river, running 'through caverns measureless to man down to a sunless sea.'" The music of this section, of the whole of the symphonic poem, indeed, has a richness of fantasy, an individuality of feeling, which, even when it reminds us of the work of other men, yet contributes something of its own to the discourse: something self-sprung and integrative. Griffes had not yet found himself: his derivations are obvious; but behind and beneath those derivations was an emerging personality.

* * *

Broken Airs

HE WAS A fastidious craftsman, a scrupulous artist. He was neither smug nor pretentious nor accommodating. He went his own way, modestly, quietly, unswervingly. Having the vision of the few, he had treasured, perhaps, that discourse of Plato's upon Beauty: "It is not like any face or hands or bodily thing; it is not in something else, neither living thing, nor earth nor heaven; only by itself in its own way, in one form, it forever is."

That conviction may have sustained him in more than one downcast hour. It cannot equally solace us; for we remember that the gift of eloquent and salient speech is an unpredictable event, obeying that baffling law of rhythmical occurrence whose comprehension, declares the subtlest of modern essayists, we may not know; for it flits upon an orbit that is mysteriously curved, keeping no man knows what tryst with time.

Listening to the music that he has left us, we can only say, as it was said in other years and to another memory: "Here are the broken airs that once you loved. They are but the breath of what has been: only are they for this, that they do the will of beauty and regret."

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
MAY 17 1931

Hunger for Orchestra Music Not So Pressing as Supposed

Fewer Concerts Given in New York—Boston Anniversary Event of Season

By L. R. BOALS

The early part of the month of May brings to a close the musical season, at least, in the eastern part of the country. The opera season, the symphony concerts and all concerts of major importance are things of the past, temporarily, by the middle of May. The musical staticians sum up the year and publish their columns of figures. Those figures, incidentally, show that considerably fewer concerts were given in New York this year than have been given for a considerable number of years past.

The last season has marked the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that famous organization celebrated the event more or less, throughout the season. One product of the anniversary is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra: 1881-1931," by M. A. De Wolfe Howe, published by the Houghton Mifflin Co. The work is not entirely new, but has been revised and brought up to date.

There is much in the book about Col. Henry L. Higginson, who founded the orchestra and supported it throughout his lifetime. Rich men have their toys, and, as Richard Aldrich said long ago, this orchestra was Colonel Higginson's yacht, racing stable, or what you will. Colonel Higginson was a good musician and a fervent lover of good music and took delight in giving his community the advantage of hearing the best.

Wrecked by War

Before the war it was pretty generally conceded that the Boston orchestra was the best organization of its kind in this country. The war just about wrecked it. Its conductor, Karl Muck, was interned, if I remember correctly, and all the Germans in the instrumental body had to be dismissed. Popular feeling made that imperative. More than 30 new men were engaged. Anyone at all familiar with the fine teamwork necessary in a really great orchestra knows what that change would do to such an organization. And on top of that came salary troubles and a threatened strike. It took years and several conductors to get the orchestra back to its old place among the three or four greatest.

One of the interesting events of the anniversary season was the return to the conductor's desk of Sir George Henshel after 50 years. Henshel was the first conductor of the orchestra and it was fortunate that at 80 years of age he was still vigorous enough to cross the ocean from England and conduct his first program of 1881, with but one change in it. Of course, not one of the original orchestra sat under his anniversary direction, and only two were able to be present.

The orchestra's programs, in all probability, were not on a par with those of past seasons. The conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, had invited compositions in commemoration of the anniversary, and would feel bound to play any of them that had any merit at all. It would be interesting to know just how much good score paper was ruined because of that invitation. Outstanding among the new compositions is said to be Stravinsky's symphony of psalms, written to "the glory of God" and dedicated to the Boston organization.

Set Standard for Orchestrs

The high standard of this orchestra when it was but six years old seems to have had beneficial effect on the orchestras of New York. Writing of its first visit to the metropolis, Mr. Henderson, of the Sun, says: "There is abundant reason why New York should rejoice in the fame and prosperity of the Boston orchestra. We have enjoyed its superb performances ever since it first visited us in 1887. There have been seasons when they fell below their highest level both in the planning of their programs and in the technics of performance, but there has never been a season when they were not worthy of the support which the local public has given them. At this day the support is once again what it was in the era of Muck. There are no empty seats when the men from the East fill the stage of Carnegie Hall.

"There was real excitement in the old Steinway Hall down in Fourteenth St. when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gaves its first New York concert in the spring of 1887. Local musicians flocked to the hall and the inner circle of music lovers and patrons, with William Steinway at the head, was out in full force. The conductor at that time was Wilhelm Gericke. . . . The opening number was the 'Oberon' overture. At its close there was an outburst of cheering. The triumph was due chiefly to the splendid body of strings, which proclaimed the richness of the finale with an effect greatly heightened by the peculiarly brilliant and sonorous acoustics of the old hall.

"There was some hesitation in the critical comments of the following day, but the concensus disclosed a feeling that there was going to be a revision of local orchestras standards. The suggestion that the wood winds of the orchestra were not up to the level of the strings was accepted by Mr. Gericke in good part. He brought from the Paris Opera Comique for the next season a new flute and a new oboe who worked a beneficial change in the wood section. To keep up with a string section headed by Franz Kneisel and Charles Martin Loeffler was not an easy matter."

Probably cheering is not often, if ever, heard at present day concerts of the Boston orchestra; But continuously sold out houses are much more cheering than many shouts.

Many Orchestras Fail

The fact that the New York Philharmonic Symphony concerts and those of the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras, given in New York, are always sold out leads individuals and organizations into costly errors. Almost every season new orchestras are organized in New York to meet the crying want of good orchestral music for the mighty army of the hungry ones who cannot procure seats for the Philharmonic, Philadelphia, or Boston orchestras. For a number of years past a succession of orchestras has moved across th...

206

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAY 21 1931

ART FOR ART'S SAKE HIS MOTTO, MAYBE

Editor The Chronicle—Sir: I see that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, refused to conduct the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna on the ground that the anthem is not "good music." I would like to know what anthem can be considered "good music." I remember when Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, refused to play the "Star-Spangled Banner" in war times and found himself in a peck of trouble. The mediocrity of the music was not his excuse. Whether musically important or not a national anthem is always important politically and patriotically and it would not be surprising to find Toscanini involved in a controversy with Il Duce like that of General Butler. No apology, however, could lift the Fascist anthem to the rank of "good music." J. W. ROSS.

San Francisco, May 19, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

MAY 22 1931

TOSCANINI NOW HELD PRISONER

Prefers That to Crowds in Milan—Passport Has Been Revoked.

Paris, May 22 (INS)—Friends of Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, today confirmed reports that he is being held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home.

The friends said they were able to speak to the conductor over the telephone and that he admitted that his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that the night of the concert when he was attacked and severely pummelled by the enraged audience. The passport will be returned to him later, police told him.

The action of the Italian official was believed to mean that Toscanini will be "disciplined" for his seeming lack of patriotism, although he refused to play the anthem because he did not consider it good music in keeping with his already prepared program.

Toscanini's friends in Paris protested strongly against his treatment and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that he had cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival to be held in Milan, June 7 to 17. In his message to the manager of the festival, he protested against the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini."

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAY 23 1931

DR. MUCK'S CASE

A Reader Asserts His Internment Was Warranted

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Reading your editorial concerning our Government's treatment of Dr. Muck with its suggestion that this was one of the things for which we may now "blush with shame," I wondered how much you really knew of the matter which you criticized so sharply. The following story may have some bearing on it. Probably we will never know, but it looks so. The friend who told it to me heard it from an intimate friend of the young lady who acted as detective in the matter.

This lady, an American, was a teacher in a Boston school and making a specialty of the German language, and she went one afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony, Dr. Muck conducting. After the concert began she noticed that two women sitting directly back of her were conversing in German, but the music held her attention, and she caught only a word now and then. Gradually it dawned upon her that they were not making sentences, but using only detached words, in other words using a code, at least in part. Then she listened intently and caught names and words that suggested very serious things. Very soon they left the concert hall, and after a moment she followed them, taking the same street car with them, getting off at the same place, and saw them enter a house close to that corner.

She was too troubled to sleep that night, went again to the corner where they had left the car and stood there wondering what she ought to do about it, for it was evident that the women had not gone to the concert to hear the music, but to give information to some third person either sitting near them or, perhaps, communicating with someone on the concert stage by lip reading. Certainly there was no reason for using code between themselves when they remained together after going out.

As the young lady stood there on the corner, one of the women came out of the house and boarded a street car, and the girl also took the car. Whether the other woman was already on the car or entered soon after unobserved, she could not tell, but presently the first woman rose to leave and passing along the aisle dropped a tiny folded paper into the lap of the other woman.

It was a question whether to follow the first or remain and watch the second woman, but the girl remained and followed her when she left the car and entered one of the old Boston hotels. The woman who had left the car first was already there, and the two women went at once to the elevator. So did the girl, who got off at the same floor and secured the number of the room which they entered. Then she went to the telephone and called up the secret service and told them she believed she had valuable and serious information for them. She was told to remain in the hotel lobby, and a man would be sent to her, whom she might recognize by a certain flower in his lapel. Presently he came, greeted her rather effusively, as if they were friends and apologizing for his delay in keeping their appointment, quietly leading her to a side room where they could talk unobserved. He questioned her closely, then thanked her and said that was all and that she was then free to go.

Very soon after that Dr. Muck was arrested. For a long time she heard nothing more of the matter, and I think it was not till after the close of the war that she received a letter from the Government thanking her warmly for the good work she had done and saying she had been instrumental in uncovering one of the most dangerous conspiracies of the war. Perhaps there was good reason for interning Dr. Muck.

K. B. K.

Saybrook, May 19, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRONX HOME NEWS

22 1931

Friends Say Toscanini Is Prisoner in His Home

Paris.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini said here today that the famous conductor is a prisoner in his home at Milan, unable to leave for Vienna, where he is scheduled to fill a concert engagement within 24 hours, because the Fascist Government has taken his passport from him.

The Government's action is in reprisal for Toscanini's refusal to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn at a concert he conducted in Bologna a few days ago. Toscanini's friends, who talked to him by telephone last night, said that the Bologna demonstration, in which Toscanini was struck several times by members of a mob, was evidently planned by the authorities.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so enraged by the treatment of Toscanini that he has cancelled an engagement to conduct at a festival in the Scala Theater, Milan, which will be held from June 7 to 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES

23 [illegible]

ASCISTS

for many e New York ra, who has the past few prisoner in o leave for cert engage-taken from d he cannot

der. No ex-
but he and t is due to the Fascist leaders because he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert which he conducted at Bologna a few days ago.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When the request was made of him, he replied that it would spoil the entire effect. It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade.

When he drove to the concert hall in company with his lawyer they were attacked by the crowd, which had been informed of the incident, seriously injuring his companion.

The government is now punishing him by taking away his passports, and not permitting him to leave the country.

This savors more of the Soviets than of the Italians, even under the iron rule of Mussolini. But the whole thing will be ridiculed throughout the world, except, of course, Russia, and the Duce ought to see it; there is no denying his sagacity and his clear thinking, even if he is a dictator. If nothing else, his sense of humor ought to enable him to laugh it off. Why doesn't he attribute it to the artistic temperament.

And along these lines, the following is of interest:

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchesrta, who is in Paris, has announced that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

But what a reception Arturo will get when he raises his baton at the first concert he conducts on his return to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post Intelligencer

MAY 23 1931

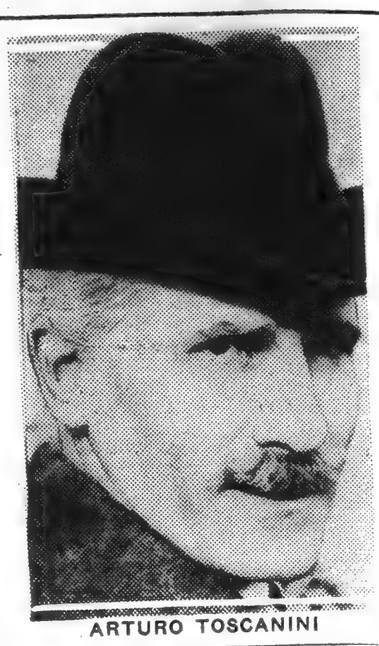
Fascists Persecute, Imprison Toscanini

PARIS, May 22.—(Universal Service)—Indications that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, is being subjected to harsh methods of discipline by Fascist authorities became even plainer today.

Toscanini, who was beaten by Fascists when he refused to conduct an orchestra playing the Fascist national hymn in Bologna last week, is reported to be a virtual prisoner in his Milan residence.

At a late hour tonight, he had not yet responded to several urgent telegrams sent him Wednesday and Thursday. Advices from New York also state that the conductor has not answered many messages cabled to him in Milan.

The French telegraph administration today declared that a message sent Toscanini from Paris on Thursday was acknowledged in Milan as having been delivered at 10:10 o'clock this morning, which indicates plainly that authorities delayed delivery and probably will not permit Toscanini to make any response.



ARTURO TOSCANINI

Most of the messages sent to the famous maestro requested corroboration of the report that his passport had been withdrawn as a punitive measure by the authorities, and asked details of his future plans.

Efforts made to get in touch with Toscanini by telephone have been for the most part unsuccessful, but friends here say that he has advised them by telephone that without his passport he will be forced to remain in Milan as long as authorities see fit to detain him. This method of discipline has been employed before by Fascists, it is stated here.

Protesting against the treatment of Toscanini, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he has cancelled two programs arranged for the music festival in Milan, June 7 to 17. He characterized the persecution of Toscanini as "an unbelieveable outrage."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 23 1931

Koussevitzky May Yet Agree to Play at Milan; Await Toscanini's Fate

PARIS, May 23 (United Press)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, may let consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had cancelled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision. The Scala management, it was said, had urged him to rescind his cancellation of the engagement.

The Italian embassy here discounted a report that Toscanini's passport had been withdrawn because he refused to play the Fascist and national anthems at a Milan concert appearance. Embassy officials said they would certainly be informed of such action if it were true.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 23 1931

Koussevitzky May Yet Agree to Play at Milan; Await Toscanini's Fate

PARIS, May 23 (United Press)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, may let consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had cancelled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision. The Scala management, it was said, [illegible] to

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST

MAY 23 193[illegible]

RESENTS TREATMENT

Orchestra Leader May Appear Despite Toscanini Incident

By United Press.

PARIS, May 23.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, may consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had canceled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

MAY 23 1931

Thus while we Americans can understand the intensive patriotism that would result in severely censoring and curtailing the liberty of an alien citizen in time of war because he refused to play our national anthem, it is not so easy to get at the Fascist intolerance. For here was an internationally famous son of Italy returning home. The incident seems to illustrate the intensive kind of nationalism which is super-imposed by a dictatorship, something quite apart from the genuine spirit of the Italian people who would have greeted Toscanini warmly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

MA[illegible]

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason, Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfil the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductr'os refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had beeen planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontier of his own country.

206

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

MAY 21 1931

ART FOR ART'S SAKE HIS MOTTO, MAYBE

Editor The Chronicle—Sir: I see that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, refused to conduct the Fascist anthem at a concert in Bologna on the ground that the anthem is not "good music." I would like to know what anthem can be considered "good music." I remember when Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, refused to play the "Star Spangled Banner" in war times and found himself in a peck of trouble. The mediocrity of the music was not his excuse. Whether musically important or not a national anthem is always important politically and patriotically and it would not be surprising to find Toscanini involved in a controversy with Il Duce like that of General Butler. No apology, however, could lift the Fascist anthem to the rank of "good music." J. W. ROSS.

San Francisco, May 19, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

MAY 22 1931

TOSCAN... HELD

Prefers Tha... Milan—Pa... Re...

Paris, May ... Arturo Toscan... New York Ph... today confirm... being held a ... Milan home.

The friends ... speak to the ci... phone and thr... his passport had been revoked, following his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert in Bologna.

Toscanini is said to have admitted that he was not forced to remain in the house, but declared he preferred to do so to avoid demonstrations in the street such as that Pickford nas! Others find tall girls their Waterloos. Peggy Joyce, for example, is quite tall—and Peggy holds the national matrimonial record!

Gladys ...

There is, however, one beau... is not influenced by personal ... —and that is the beauty of ... smooth skin. For everyone rec... the loveliness of healthy, ... skin. And everyone—or so I ... recognizes the importance of ... ness in achieving such a skin.

However, there are a num... women who wish to do right b... skins, but do not know whic... cleansing method to adopt—th... and water, or the cleansing ... process. And in my opinio... thing for such women to do is ... periment—to try both metho... find out which one reacts most ... ably on their...

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAY 22 1931

DR. MUCK'S CASE

A Reader Asserts His Internment Was Warranted

To the Editor of The Courant:—

Reading your editorial concerning our Government's treatment of Dr. Muck with its suggestion that this was one of the things for which we may now "blush with shame," I wondered how much you really knew of the matter which you criticized so sharply. The following story may have some bearing on it. Probably we will never know, but it looks so. The friend who told it to me heard it from an intimate friend of the young lady who acted as detective in the matter.

This lady, an American, was a teacher in a Boston school and making a specialty of the German language, and she went one afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony, Dr. Muck conducting. After the concert began she noticed that two women sitting directly back of her were conversing in German, but the music held her attention, and she caught only a word now and then. Gradually it dawned upon her that they were not making sentences, but using only detached words, in other words using a code, at least in part. Then she listened intently and caught names and words that suggested very serious things. Very soon they left the concert hall, and after a moment she followed them, taking the same street car with them, getting off at the same place, and saw them enter a house close to that corner.

She was too troubled to sleep that night, went again to the corner where they had left the car and stood there wondering what she ought to do about it, for it was evident that the women had not gone to the concert to hear the music, but to give information to some third person either sitting near them or, perhaps, communicating with someone on the concert stage by lip reading. Certainly there was no reason for using code between themselves when they remained together after going out.

As the young lady stood there on the corner, one of the women came out of the house and boarded a street car, and the girl also took the car. Whether the other woman was already on the car or entered soon after unobserved, she could not tell, but presently the first woman rose to leave and passing along the aisle dropped a tiny folded paper into the lap of the other woman.

It was a question whether to follow the first or remain and watch the second woman, but the girl remained and followed her when she left the car and entered one of the old Boston hotels. The woman who had left the car first was already there, and the two women went at once to the elevator. So did the girl, who got off at the same floor and secured the number of the room which they entered. Then she went to the telephone and called up the secret service and told them she believed she had valuable and serious information for them. She was told to remain in the hotel lobby, and a man would be sent to her, whom she might recognize by a certain flower in his lapel. Presently he came, greeted her rather effusively, as if they were friends and apologizing for his delay in keeping their appointment, quietly leading her to a side room where they could talk unobserved. He questioned her closely, then thanked her and said that was all and that she was then free to go.

Very soon after that Dr. Muck was arrested. For a long time she heard nothing more of the matter, and I think it was not till after the close of the war that she received a letter from the Government thanking her warmly for the good work she had done and saying she had been instrumental in uncovering one of the most dangerous conspiracies of the war. Perhaps there was good reason for interning Dr. Muck.

K. B. K.

Saybrook, May 19, 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRONX HOME NEWS

MAY 22 1931

Friends Say Toscanini Is Prisoner in His Home

Paris.—Friends of Arturo Toscanini said here today that the famous conductor is a prisoner in his home at Milan, unable to leave for Vienna, where he is scheduled to fill a concert engagement within 24 hours, because the Fascist Government has taken his passport from him.

The Government's action is in reprisal for Toscanini's refusal to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn at a concert he conducted in Bologna a few days ago. Toscanini's friends, who talked to him by telephone last night, said that the Bologna demonstration, in which Toscanini was struck several times by members of a mob, was evidently planned by the authorities.

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is so enraged by the treatment of Toscanini that he has cancelled an engagement to conduct at a festival in the Scala Theater, Milan, which will be held from June 7 to 17.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEBSTER, MASS.
EVE. TIMES

MAY 23 1931

ARTISTS AND FASCISTS

Arturo Toscanini, for many years conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, who has been in Europe for the past few weeks, is virtually a prisoner in Milan, Italy.

When preparing to leave for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement his passport was taken from him by the police, and he cannot cross the Italian border. No explanation was given, but he, and everyone knows that it is due to the Fascist leaders because he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert which he conducted at Bologna a few days ago.

The conductor's refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When the request was made of him, he replied that it would spoil the entire effect. It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade.

When he drove to the concert hall in company with his lawyer they were attacked by the crowd, which had been informed of the incident, seriously injuring his companion.

The government is now punishing him by taking away his passports, and not permitting him to leave the country.

This savors more of the Soviets than of the Italians, even under the iron rule of Mussolini. But the whole thing will be ridiculed throughout the world, except, of course, Russia, and the Duce ought to see it; there is no denying his sagacity and his clear thinking, even if he is a dictator. If nothing else, his sense of humor ought to enable him to laugh it off. Why doesn't he attribute it to the artistic temperament.

And along these lines, the following is of interest:

Serge Koussevitzy, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchesrta, who is in Paris, has announced that he had refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala called back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

But what a reception Arturo will get when he raises his baton at the first concert he conducts on his return to New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
Post Intelligencer

MAY 23 1931

...n account of the professor... ...explanation of the conclusi... ...in the most interesting arti... ...e — in next Sunday's Ame... ...s unusual revelation!

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 23 1931

...CONTINUED ON PAGE 3.

Koussevitzky May Yet Agree to Play at Milan; Await Toscanini's Fate

PARIS, May 23 (United Press)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, may let consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had cancelled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision. The Scala management, it was said, had urged him to rescind his cancellation of the engagement.

The Italian embassy here discounted a report that Toscanini's passport had been withdrawn because he refused to play the Fascist and national anthems at a Milan concert appearance. Embassy officials said they would certainly be informed of such action if it were true.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 23 1931

Koussevitzky May Yet Agree to Play at Milan; Await Toscanini's Fate

PARIS, May 23 (United Press)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, may let consent to appear at the Scala Opera House in Milan, despite his indignation over the Toscanini incident.

The Boston conductor, who said he had cancelled his Italian engagement in protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, is awaiting further developments in that case, it was said today, before making a definite decision. The Scala management, it was said, had urged him to rescind his cancellation of the engagement.

The Italian embassy here discounted a report that Toscanini's passport had been withdrawn because he refused to play the Fascist and national anthems at a Milan concert appearance. Embassy officials said they would certainly be informed of such action if it were true.

...in the attorney's first big battle against the underworld as a prosecutor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

MAY 23 1931

THE AFFAIR AT BOLOGNA.

What is art and what is patriotism is a question that the concert-goers of the United were once called upon to decide when Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to open a concert with "The Star Spangled Banner." It was shortly after the United States declared war against Germany and every German-American was suspect. The test of patriotism was applied to Dr. Muck with the request to play our national anthem. He politely declined on the ground that it was "inartistic" and not adapted to orchestration, not by his orchestra at least. Dr. Muck was convicted of being an alien enemy within our midst on the spot, and was seized and sent to the internment camp at Oglethrope, Georgia, where we kept most of our prominent German-American citizens during the war.

In America we do not understand how the Fascist Government could treat Signor Arturo Toscanini so rudely because he refused to play either the Fascist march or the Fascist hymn at a concert at Bologna. The distinguished conductor who has captivated Europe with his concerts, was nearly mobbed. Cries of "A morte!" (kill him!) were heard in the Bologna Theater and the Italian police have taken his passport from him. In his native country Toscanini is virtually a prisoner and the Fascist Government it is said, will keep him there for some time in order to "discipline" him for his effrontery.

Thus while we Americans can understand the intensive patriotism that would result in severely censoring and curtailing the liberty of an alien citizen in time of war because he refused to play our national anthem, it is not so easy to get at the Fascist intolerance. For here was an internationally famous son of Italy returning home. The incident seems to illustrate the intensive kind of nationalism which is super-imposed by a dictatorship, something quite apart from the genuine spirit of the Italian people who would have greeted Toscanini warmly.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

MAY 1931

PROTESTS ATTACK ON TOSCANINI

Boston Symphony Conductor Cancels Contract to Conduct Festival in Milan

PARIS, May 23—As a protest against the attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna and the maestro's treatment by the Fascist authorities, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his contract to conduct at a music festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan from June 7 to June 17. Mr. Koussevitzky cabled the Scala Theatre that the "unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini was an offence against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and therefore felt obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

When the manager of the Scala wired back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was sufficient reason for a breach of contract, Mr. Koussevitzky replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason, Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Friends of Signor Toscanini in Paris were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him by the Italian police and that he was a "voluntary" prisoner in his house. The police informed him that the passport would be returned, but why it was taken from him neither he nor anyone else seems to understand.

Signor Toscanini ought to leave within the next 48 hours for Vienna to fulfill a concert engagement there, but it seems entirely to depend on the good-will of the Fascist police whether or not he will be able to fulfill the engagement.

The conductor admitted that the treatment he had received in his own country since the affair at Bologna had considerably affected his health and nerves. He said, however, that he was trying to keep his patience and temper, and it is to avoid any demonstrations in the street, either in his favor or hostile, such as those at Bologna, that he is remaining at home. Naturally enough, he did not wish to talk freely on the telephone. His greatest concern is lest he should not get his passport back and become a virtual prisoner in his own country.

Private information which has come through regarding the incidents at Bologna indicate clearly that the prevention of Signor Toscanini's concert there was deliberate and in conjunction with the Fascist leaders of the city. The conductr'os refusal to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at his concert was based on purely artistic grounds. When he was requested by Leandro Arpinati, Under-Secretary of State for the Interior, and the Prefect of Bologna to do this, he replied that it would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

It was then suggested that the municipal band should play the two anthems before the concert began. Signor Toscanini refused, declaring that it would turn the whole concert into a masquerade. The only persons present at this interview were the conductor, Signor Arpinati and the Prefect. However, when Signor Toscanini drove to the concert the attack on him showed that news of his refusal had been deliberately spread among Fascists and that the attack had beeen planned and timed. It accorded with what had been written in the Fascist press against "spending so much money on concerts."

Signor Toscanini added that he and his lawyer, who is himself a Fascist, were greeted with cries of "A morte!" ("Kill him!") and that both received blows, the lawyer being seriously hurt.

Except for this incident, in which he was an entirely innocent victim, Signor Toscanini's friends declared there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontier of his own country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

MAY 23 1931

Toscanini Silent; Harsh Fascisti Methods Hinted

PARIS, May 22.—(Universal Service Special Cable.)—Indications that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, is being subjected to harsh methods of discipline by Fascist authorities became even plainer today.

Toscanini, who was beaten by Fascists when he refused to conduct an orchestra playing the Fascist national hymn in Bologna last week, is reported to be a virtual prisoner in his Milan residence.

At a late hour tonight he had not yet responded to several urgent telegrams sent him Wednesday and Thursday. Advices from New York also state that the conductor has not answered many messages cabled to him in Milan.

Protesting against the treatment of Toscanini, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he has canceled two programs arranged for the music festival in Milan June 7 to 17. He characterized the persecution of Toscanini as "an unbelievable outrage."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

MAY 26 1931

...where ...chestral ...prisoner ...ssports, ... Fascist ...experi... ...country ...Amer... ...oncerts ...hestra. ...th the ...rogram ...canini'

THIS CLIPPING FROM
...Y, OHIO
...RIBUNE

MAY 26 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

MAY 24 1931

—Italy begins to show signs of artistic retrogression when it tries to mix music with politics. The sympathies of the musical world will undoubtedly be with Arturo Toscanini in his persecution by the Fascist Government, a practical indication of which is the summary cancellation by Serge Koussevitsky of his contract to conduct during the festival in the Scala Theatre at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini. Fascism, it appears, is becoming one of the most absolute of tyrannies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

MAY 25 1931

Disciplining Toscanini

Fascism may or may not have been of some benefit to Italy—there are differences of opinion on this point—but in some of its manifestations it has been injurious to the reputation both of Mussolini and of the nation that delights to honor him. The objection to his regime is not so much that it is despotism, though that a normally liberty-loving people should patiently endure such constant interference with individual freedom is strange, as that it is a peculiarly mean kind of despotism. Hundreds of distinguished citizens have been arrested and deported without trial, and murder has been done without bringing the murderers to justice. Now a great artist like Arturo Toscanini, famous the world over, is being subjected to petty persecution because he refused to play "Giovanessa," the Fascist hymn, at a concert in Bologna.

His reason was the perfectly proper one that the occasion was inappropriate. In consequence he was treated with violence by a Fascist mob. Like Guiglielmo Ferrero and Benedetto Croce before him, he was made a "voluntary" prisoner in his own house. Such episodes as these are worthy of "King Bomba" in his worst days as ruler of the Two Sicilies. If a policy like this is continued, it will be open to argument whether Italy is any longer a civilized country. Koussevitsky, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his opinion by cancelling an engagement to appear in Milan. He doubtless represents the feelings of most musicians at such an outrage to one of the great conductors of the world.

The Italians themselves should realize—doubtless many of them do—that episodes of the sort not only create animosity to their country, but make it ridiculous as well. Fascism has already done much to Prussianize Italy and brutalize the whole administration of public affairs. Its interference with artistic and intellectual freedom, if persisted in, is a sad commentary on the spirit of evil that dominates it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAY 25 1931

Music

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been accused of high-hatting the standard composers in favor of modern men, especially those of the radical left wing, and it is true that he has introduced much new music to America, some of it unmistakably important.

When it comes to a question of neglecting the classics, however, Mr. Koussevitzky's record speaks for itself. On his Boston Symphony Orchestra programs of last season Bach was represented by seventeen compositions, Beethoven by seven, Brahms by five, Mozart by four, Haydn by three, Schumann by three, Handel and Schubert by two each.

In addition four works each by Wagner and by Richard Strauss were played, and two each by Tschaikowsky and by Debussy. This seems very much like giving standard works their due.

FAMOUS MUSICIAN MAY BE ALLOWED TO LEAVE MILAN

Refusal To Play National Anthem Causes Disturbance

OTHERS INDIGNANT

Over Treatment Accorded Toscanini; Koussevitsky Breaks Date

Rome, My 26.—INS—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the perfect of Milan who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution," said Mussolini.

"We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident," Mussolni continued. "There has been NO official communication, and we have no intention of making one."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm suffered when he was attacked.

Paris, May 26—INS—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Sedrge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York Symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he suffered when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for late appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy, because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Other artists applauded Koussevitsky for spurning the Italian engagement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN

MAY 26 1931

MUSIC WORLD INCENSED AT ITALY

Protesting Treatment of Arturo Toscanini

PARIS, May 26. (INS).—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York Symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he received when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for later appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment to Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be presecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Other artists applauded Koussevitsky for spurning the Italian engagement.

ROME, May 26. (INS).—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play th Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the Amer...

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAUMONT, TEX.
ENTERPRISE

BOSTON MUSICIAN BOYCOTTS ITALY

Attacks on Toscanini in Bologna and Milam Given As Reason

By Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25.—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so.

"It is not a matter of what his political opinions may be.

"It is outrageous for an old man of 64 to be struck by young men. The whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Meanwhile, all efforts to communicate with the Italian maestro in Milan are futile. Toscanini himself declines to answer telephone calls, since to do so would embroil him with the fascist censors, and others in his residence are unwilling to say a word and are most reluctant under questioning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

MAY 26 1931

FASCIST RAID UPON TOSCANINI IS PROTESTED

Boston Conductor Declares He Will Not Go to Milan Unless Attack On Musician is Settled.

Paris—(U.P.)—Only an "Amiable settlement" of the recent controversey between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala Theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Balogna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defense of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitsky informed the Scala directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 26 1931

Close Toscanini 'Incident' Today

Passport of N. Y. Philharmonic Conductor Expected to Be Returned

By International News

ROME, May 26.—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm suffered when he was attacked.

Paris in Violent Protest

By International News

PARIS, May 26.—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of his compatriot, said he believed that artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

MAY 26 1931

TOSCANINI MAY APOLOGIZE TO GAIN FREEDOM

Orchestra Conductor Is Held Prisoner in Milan Home

BRUISES HEALING

Mussolini Treats Affair in Light of Minor Importance

Universal News Service

ROME, May 25—A way out of his distressing predicament which would pacify high Fascist circles and permit him to leave Milan in peace within a few days was offered to Arturo Toscanini, 64, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today.

The government has instructed the prefect of Milan to try to obtain Toscanini's declaration that he did not intend to offend the Fascist regime when he refused to conduct an orchestra in the Fascist national hymn in Bologna.

PARLEYS ARRANGED

Parleys between the maestro and the prefect have been going on for several days in Toscanini's Milan residence, where he has been detained through the withdrawal of his passport and the guarding of his home by police.

Toscanini is recovering from injuries suffered at the hands of Fascists who attacked and beat him in Bologna. His right arm is reported to be improving, and he has been treated for injuries about the head.

Should Toscanini inform the authorities that the slight on Fascism's hymn was unintentional, he would be free to leave Milan within a few days, it was stated authoritatively. Fascism's complaint is that Toscanini played American and British national anthems in his recent London concerts and that his refusal to play the Fascist anthem was an insult to the Italian government.

MUSSOLINI UNDISTURBED

An interview with Premier Mussolini today clarified the goverhment's attitude in the affair.

"We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication, and we have no intention of making one."

Universal News Service

PARIS, May 25—Declaring that "The Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

All efforts to communicate with the Italian maestro in Milan are futile. Toscanini himself declines to answer telephone calls, since to do so would embroil him with the Fascist censors, and others in his residence are unwilling to say a word and are most reluctant under questioning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL GAZETTE

MAY 26 1931

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi... at Toscanini Foe...

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only ... "amiable settlement" of the re... controversy between Arturo Toscani... and youthful Fascists of Bologna wi... persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cea... his efforts to break a contract with th... Scala theater in Milan, the conducto... of the Boston Symphony orchestra sai... today.

Toscanini was slapped and punche... by Fascists at Bologna when he refuse... to play the national anthem and th... Fascist hymn at the opening of a con... cert. He is conductor of the New Yor... Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested agains... th... treatment of Toscanini by attempt... in... to end his contract at Milan, sai... th... the noted conductor "belongs t... the... world," that art is universal an... th... a concert is an artistic and not ... pol... al event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

MAY 23 1931

Tosca Fasc

PARIS, May ice Special Cab
Arturo Toscan
New York Phi is being subj ods of discipli ities became Toscanini,
Fascists whe duct an orch cist national week, is rep prisoner in
At a late h

first duly sworn, on o
May
the crime of was committed by who, at the time and and with malice human being.

Cor

David H. Clark issued s of murder complaints d his eight years as Deputy trict Attorney, several yea which he served as chief complaint department.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

MAY 24 1931

—Italy begins to show signs of artistic retrogression when it tries to mix music with politics. The sympathies of the musical world will undoubtedly be with Arturo Toscanini in his persecution by the Fascist Government, a practical indication of which is the summary cancellation by Serge Koussevitsky of his contract to conduct during the festival in the Scala Theatre at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini. Fascism, it appears, is becoming one of the most absolute of tyrannies.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

Disciplining Toscanini

Fascism may or may not have been of some benefit to Italy—there are differences of opinion on this point—but in some of its manifestations it has been injurious to the reputation both of Mussolini and of the nation that delights to honor him. The objection to his regime is not so much that it is despotism, though that a normally liberty-loving people should patiently endure such constant interference with individual freedom is strange, as that it is a peculiarly mean kind of despotism. Hundreds of distinguished citizens have been arrested and deported without trial, and murder has been done without bringing the murderers to justice. Now a great artist like Arturo Toscanini, famous the world over, is being subjected to petty persecution because he refused to play "Giovanessa," the Fascist hymn, at a concert in Bologna.

His reason was the perfectly proper one that the occasion was inappropriate. In consequence he was treated with violence by a Fascist mob. Like Guiglielmo Ferrero and Benedetto Croce before him, he was made a "voluntary" prisoner in his own house. Such episodes as these are worthy of "King Bomba" in his worst days as ruler of the Two Sicilies. If a policy like this is continued, it will be open to argument whether Italy is any longer a civilized country. Koussevitsky, the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has expressed his opinion by cancelling an engagement to appear in Milan. He doubtless represents the feelings of most musicians at such an outrage to one of the great conductors of the world.

The Italians themselves should realize—doubtless many of them do—that episodes of the sort not only create animosity to their country, but make it ridiculous as well. Fascism has already done much to Prussianize Italy and brutalize the whole administration of public affairs. Its interference with artistic and intellectual freedom, if persisted in, is a sad commentary on the spirit of evil that dominates it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAY 25 1931

Music

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been accused of high hatting the standard composers in favor of modern men, especially those of the radical left wing, and it is true that he has introduced much new music to America, some of it unmistakably important.

When it comes to a question of neglecting the classics, however, Mr. Koussevitzky's record speaks for itself. On his Boston Symphony Orchestra programs of last season

Bach was represented by seventeen compositions, Beethoven by seven, Brahms by five, Mozart by four, Haydn by three, Schumann by three, Handel and Schubert by two each.

In addition four works each by Wagner and by Richard Strauss were played, and two each by Tsehaikowsky and by Debussy. This seems very much like giving standard works their due.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

MAY 26 1931

The incident at Milan, where Toscanini, the famous orchestral conductor, is detained as a prisoner in his home, deprived of passports, for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem, recalls the experience of Dr. Muck in this country when he refused to play the American national anthem at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Muck said it interfered with the artistic arrangement of his program which is the contention of Toscanini in the more recent affair.

THIS CLIPPING FROM POMEROY, OHIO
DAILY TRIBUNE

MAY 26 1931

FAMOUS MUSICIAN MAY BE ALLOWED TO LEAVE MILAN

Refusal To Play National Anthem Causes Disturbance

OTHERS INDIGNANT

Over Treatment Accorded Toscanini; Koussevitsky Breaks Date

Rome, My 26.—INS—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the perfect of Milan who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution," said Mussolini.

"We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident," Mussolni continued. "There has been NO official communication, and we have no intention of making one."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm suffered when he was attacked.

Paris, May 26—INS—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Sedrge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York Symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he suffered when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for late appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Other artists applauded Koussevitsky for spurning the Italian engagement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMBRIDGE, PA.
CITIZEN

MAY 26 1931

MUSIC WORLD INCENSED AT ITALY

Protesting Treatment of Arturo Toscanini

PARIS, May 26. (INS).—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York Symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he received when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for later appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment to Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be presecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Other artists applauded Koussevitsky for spurning the Italian engagement.

ROME, May 26. (INS).—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play th Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional, his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Attacks on Toscanini in Bologna and Milam Given As Reason

By Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25.—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so.

"It is not a matter of what his political opinions may be.

"It is outrageous for an old man of 64 to be struck by young men. The whole cultured world should rise and protest."

Meanwhile, all efforts to communicate with the Italian maestro in Milan are futile. Toscanini himself declines to answer telephone calls, since to do so would embroil him with the fascist censors, and others in his residence are unwilling to say a word and are most reluctant under questioning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

MAY 26 1931

FASCIST RAID UPON TOSCANINI IS PROTESTED

Boston Conductor Declares He Will Not Go to Milan Unless Attack On Musician is Settled.

Paris—(U.P.)—Only an "Amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala Theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Balogna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defense of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitsky informed the Scala directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that Koussevitsky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting on breaking his contract. He said that he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia—which I have quit."

his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm suffered when he was attacked.

Paris in Violent Protest

By International News

PARIS, May 26.—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of his compatriot, said he believed that artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

MAY 26 1931

TOSCANINI MAY APOLOGIZE TO GAIN FREEDOM

Orchestra Conductor Is Held Prisoner in Milan Home

BRUISES HEALING

Mussolini Treats Affair in Light of Minor Importance

Universal News Service

ROME, May 25—A way out of his distressing predicament which would pacify high Fascist circles and permit him to leave Milan in peace within a few days was offered to Arturo Toscanini, 64, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today.

The government has instructed the prefect of Milan to try to obtain Toscanini's declaration that he did not intend to offend the Fascist regime when he refused to conduct an orchestra in the Fascist national hymn in Bologna.

PARLEYS ARRANGED

Parleys between the maestro and the prefect have been going on for several days in Toscanini's Milan residence, where he has been detained through the withdrawal of his passport and the guarding of his home by police.

Toscanini is recovering from injuries suffered at the hands of Fascists who attacked and beat him in Bologna. His right arm is reported to be improving, and he has been treated for injuries about the head.

Should Toscanini inform the authorities that the slight on Fascism's hymn was unintentional, he would be free to leave Milan within a few days, it was stated authoritatively. Fascism's complaint is that Toscanini played American and British national anthems in his recent London concerts and that his refusal to play the Fascist anthem was an insult to the Italian government.

MUSSOLINI UNDISTURBED

An interview with Premier Mussolini today clarified the government's attitude in the affair.

"We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication, and we have no intention of making one."

Universal News Service

PARIS, May 25—Declaring that "The Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconisder his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

All efforts to communicate with the Italian maestro in Milan are futile. Toscanini himself declines to answer telephone calls, since to do so would embroil him with the Fascist censors, and others in his residence are unwilling to say a word and are most reluctant under questioning.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL GAZETTE

MAY 26 1931

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi at Toscanini Foes

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only a "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

Semi-Apology Italy's Price For "Insult" By Toscanini

[Copyright, 1931, by Universal Service, Inc.]

Rome, May 25—A way out of his predicament which would pacify high Facist circles and permit him to leave Milan in peace within a few days was offered to Arturd Toscanini, 64-year-old conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, today.

The Government has instructed the Prefect of Milan to try to obtain Toscanini's declaration that he did not intend to offend the Fascist regime when he refused to conduct an orchestra in the Fascist national hymn in Bologna.

Parleys between the Maestro and the Prefect have been going on for several days in Toscanini's Milan residence, where he has been detained through the withdrawal of his passport and the guarding of his home by police.

Toscanini is recovering from injuries sustained at the hands of Fascisti who attacked and beat him in Bologna. His right arm is resported tc be improving, and he has been treated for injuries on his head and the loss of a tooth.

Should Toscanini inform authorities that the slight on Fascism's hymn was unintentional he would be free to leave Milan within a few days, it was said atuhoritatively. Fascism's complaint is that Toscanini played American and British national anthems in his recent London concert, and that his refusal to play the Fascist anthem was an insult to the Italian Government.

Toscanini contended that he would not conduct the orchestra in the Fascist hymn because "it is not good music." When he said that, Fascisti in the audience attacked him.

Paris, May 25—(UP)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and Fascisti of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala Theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said the noted conducter "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defense of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitsky informed the Scala Directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17 to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

Milan officials replied that Koussevitsky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting upon breaking his contract. He said he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia—which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

Toscanini Affair Is Called Disgrace

PARIS, May 25.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by Fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25.—Declaring "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June Festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

MUSIC, IDEALS AND POLITICS

When the ideals of art come in conflict with the passions of politics, which shall give way? The question has been brought into prominence by the indignities and physical injuries suffered by Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest orchestral conductors, in his own country, Italy, for refusal to permit his programs to be marred, as he viewed it, by Fascist dictation. Toscanini has long been held in high esteem in America, formerly as director of its greatest opera company and of recent years as the chief conductor of New York's most important orchestra. And now another of the world's greatest conductors, a Russian, also highly esteemed as the head of one of the foremost orchestras of America, that of Boston, joins in the defense of art ideals against local passion.

Serge Kousevitsky has announced that he will not keep his contract to conduct two performances of a great festival to be held at the Scala theater in Milan in June because of the "unbelievable outrage" committed against Toscanini. To a distressed cry from Milan that there was no sufficient reason for a breach of contract he replied that it was a question of principle, to him a sufficient reason. To a country like Italy, whose prestige in music is so great and whose composers and musicians have so long been held in international esteem, this conflict must present a harass-

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE

Musical Notes

TOSCANINI DISCIPLINED BY MUSSOLINI FOR REFUSING TO PLAY THE FASCIST HYMN

Because of his refusal to play the Fascist Hymn at his recent Bologna concert, the famous conductor, Toscanini, is being disciplined by Mussolini who has placed him under police surveillance at his home in Milan, according to a special dispatch from that city to the N. Y. Review Saturday, in which the following appears:

Except for Toscanini's refusal to play the Facist hymn at the concert in Bologna and the resulting riot when he appeared on the street, his friends say there is no reason whatsoever why the Fascist government and police should have taken the extreme measure of depriving him of the right of a free man anywhere to have safe conduct across the frontiers of his own country.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has refused to conduct during the festival at the Scala Theatre in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. The festival will be from June 7 to 17.

Mr. Koussevitzky had intended to conduct alternately two programs of Bach, Roussel, Ravel, Brahms, Mangiazalli, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Beethoven as a climax to the Italian season, but he [illegible] after the performance.

"unbelievable outrage" against Signor Toscanini in Bologna was an offense against the whole artistic world and that he was unwilling to associate music with politics and was obliged to renounce his contract in Italy.

The manager of the Scala cabled back that it would be impossible to cancel the festival and that there was insufficient reason for a breach of the contract, whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

"It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

Twenty persons were arrested this week at a concert at the Scala Opera House for demonstrations in favor of Toscanini.

Shouting "Long live Toscanini," a number of persons in the audience interupted the first number of the concert, which was being directed by the Dutch conductor, Albert Van Raalte. Signor Toscanini had spent a large part of his professional life on the Scala stage.

Theatre attendants and carabineers halted the demonstrations, but made no arrests during the concert. They quietly noted the offenders, however, and took them into custody as they left the theatre

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

WOULD PROTEST TOSCANINI INCIDENT

Boston Symphony Conductor Says World Should Rise Against Treatment

PARIS, May 26 (INS) — Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill on engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country, and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf, should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

MUSSOLINI SOON TO RETURN TOSCANINI'S PASSPORT

ROME, May 26 (INS)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government, when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

Koussevitsky Shuns Italy After Toscanini Affront

Boston Conductor Will Not Appear Until Incident Is Settled

PARIS, May 25 (UP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is adhering to his attempt to break his contract with La Scala Theater in Milan until the Fascist dispute with Arturo Toscanini, centering around the latter's refusal to play the royal march or the Fascist Hymn at Bologna earlier this month, has been "amicably settled."

Koussevitsky wrote to La Scala that it must postpone his engagement, saying that Toscanini belongs to the world, that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political gathering. He had been expected to appear at a festival at Milan June 7 to 17, conducting two concerts which would mark the musical high point of the season in Italy.

Officials of La Scala replied that Koussevitsky's proposal was impossible, since the concerts had already been announced. Koussevitsky sent another message insisting that the contract be broken and asking that he be allowed to make his appearance at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi at Toscanini Foes

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS SENTINEL

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascisti murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the U. S. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an im-anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change tht nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RT NEWS, VA.
ILY PRESS

28 1931

SIC AND POLITICS.

on the part of the Italian Fascisti and music, has met with stubborn e part of musicians. As a result Toscanini is virtually a prisoner in n, his passport having been taken Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of mphony Orchestra, has cancelled to conduct the music festival in st against such treatment of a co-with the Fascist authorities arose declined to have either the royal scist hymn played at a concert of e conductor in Bologna. He gave at the rendition of these airs was d would destroy the unity and artistic effect of his carefully ar-. The Fascist police, unappre-e points in concert music, viewed asons as mere excuses, and pro-measures to discipline what they k of loyalty. Apparently Tos-canini's acts towards the Italian government were not in question, but this omission of patriotic display branded him as a disloyal subject. The failure of the police to return the passport may cause the conductor to remain in Italy and forego his engagement in Vienna.

Toscanini has done a noble son's work by his beloved country. He achieved the heights in music. Everywhere he goes, everywhere he plays, Italy bears the honor of his achievement. He refused to compromise what he believed a perfect arrangement in the field of his own supreme talent, where he is a recognized authority. He refused to yield to views of men less skilled and less renowned that he, who decreed that they should proscribe the test of loyalty in his own profession.

The Italian conductor knows only too well that no surer means of dealing a death blow to musical and artistic appreciation is ever at hand than to surrender its idealism to those untrained and unskilled. He stands upon a principle. He no doubt would gladly arrange a concert with an appropriate program of patriotic airs; but he would rather lay down his baton, and silence his orchestra than stifle his music, in the hurrahs of men who have done far less than he to make their country's name renowned.

The incident is merely another illustration of the Fascist determination to bring all within Italy under the iron hand of the dictator. Politics and the state may be so dealt with for a time, and survive, even prosper, but music—music is the illusive force of the soul. In bondage it wanes and dies. It has expression only in real emotion, and finds little enthusiasm in the false reaction of a deliberately applied stimulus.

If the Fascisti must excite the people to honor their cause, and in so doing trample upon all that Italy has held most dear in musical supremacy, the party is proceeding upon a false premise.

...NATI, O.
...QUIRER
MAY 26 1931

Correspondent Killed Self?

—International Newsreel Phot

JOHN N. GARFIELD.

Garfield, grandson of the marty President, James A. Garfield, believed to have shot himself death. His body was found in home at Mentor, Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

WOULD PROTEST TOSCANINI INCIDENT

Boston Symphony Conductor Says World Should Rise Against Treatment

PARIS, May 26 (INS) — Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill on engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country, and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf, should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

MUSSOLINI SOON TO RETURN TOSCANINI'S PASSPORT

ROME, May 26 (INS)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government, when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS
MAY 26 1931

TOSCANINI TO LEAVE MILAN

By International News Service.

ROME, May 26.—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthe mwas not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the Government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which h ehas been held a virtual prisoner.

Paris Musicians Protest Toscanini Treatment

PARIS, May 26 — (I. N. S.)— Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the Government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAY 26 1931

Koussevitsky Shuns Italy After Toscanini Affront

Boston Conductor Will Not Appear Until Incident Is Settled

PARIS, May 25 (UP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is adhering to his attempt to break his contract with La Scala Theater in Milan until the Fascist dispute with Arturo Toscanini, centering around the latter's refusal to play the royal march or the Fascist Hymn at Bologna earlier this month, has been "amicably settled."

Koussevitsky wrote to La Scala that it must postpone his engagement, saying that Toscanini belongs to the world, that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political gathering. He had been expected to appear at a festival at Milan June 7 to 17, conducting two concerts which would mark the musical high point of the season in Italy.

Officials of La Scala replied that Koussevitsky's proposal was impossible, since the concerts had already been announced. Koussevitsky sent another message insisting that the contract be broken and asking that he be allowed to make his appearance at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE
MAY 26 1931

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi at Toscanini Foes

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE
MAY 26 1931

Toscanini Affair Is Called Disgrace

PARIS, May 25.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by Fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAY 26 1931

Lewiston-A... Red

TOSC... FOR I...

Becau... the Fas... Bologna... ductor,... ciplined... placed... lance at... ing to a... city to... in whic...

Excep... play th... cert in... riot wh... street,... reason... governm... taken t... priving... man a... duct a... own co...

Serg... of the... tra, ha... the fes... Milan... on Sig... will be...

Mr.... to con... grams:... Brahm... Prokof... max...

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS SENTINEL
MAY 25 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascisti murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the U. S. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an im-anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change tht nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
MAY 26 1931

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAY 26 1931

Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25.—Declaring "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June Festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE
MAY 26 1931

KOUSSEVITS... TO PLAY AT...

Paris, May... ice)—Declaring... incident in Bo... uation in Mila... Italian govern... vitsky, conduc... phony orchest... attempts to p... sider his refus... ment to play... in the June fe...

WO...

MUSS... the... country... marines... State D...

But h... opinion... vealed t... and cru... of the w... the dict... ment of... Fascist...

As a... Signor... loyalty... nities w... ship of...

Becau... and as... demand... concert... Fascist... the subc... by with... ing him...

Serge... Sympho... in Mila... outrage...

It is h... boycotts... ture of... apparen... their se... from Fa...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
MAY

MUSIC, IDEALS AND POLITICS

When the ideals of art come in conflict with the passions of politics, which shall give way? The question has been brought into prominence by the indignities and physical injuries suffered by Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest orchestral conductors, in his own country, Italy, for refusal to permit his programs to be marred, as he viewed it, by Fascist dictation. Toscanini has long been held in high esteem in America, formerly as director of its greatest opera company and of recent years as the chief conductor of New York's most important orchestra. And now another of the world's greatest conductors, a Russian, also highly esteemed as the head of one of the foremost orchestras of America, that of Boston, joins in the defense of art ideals against local passion

Serge Kousevitsky has announced that he will not keep his contract to conduct two performances of a great festival to be held at the Scala theater in Milan in June because of the "unbelievable outrage" committed against Toscanini. To a distressed cry from Milan that there was no sufficient reason for a breach of contract he replied that it was a question of principle, to him a sufficient reason. To a country like Italy, whose prestige in music is so great and whose composers and musicians have so long been held in international esteem, this conflict must present a harass-

...rt generally it is a ... It is a break in the ...l brotherhood that ...tsevitsky also comes ...which when it speaks ...f music gets a wel- ...l geog- ...belief ...sic to ...onds. ...has ...mpts ...e it ...ater ...ence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
DAILY PRESS
MAY 28 1931

MUSIC AND POLITICS.

An attempt on the part of the Italian Fascisti to mix politics and music, has met with stubborn resistance on the part of musicians. As a result the celebrated Toscanini is virtually a prisoner in his villa at Milan, his passport having been taken from him; and Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled his engagement to conduct the music festival in Milan, in protest against such treatment of a co-worker.

The difficulty with the Fascist authorities arose when Toscanini declined to have either the royal march or the Fascist hymn played at a concert of which he was the conductor in Bologna. He gave as his reason, that the rendition of these airs was inopportune, and would destroy the unity and spoil the whole artistic effect of his carefully arranged program. The Fascist police, unappreciative of the fine points in concert music, viewed the projected reasons as mere excuses, and proceeded to take measures to discipline what they considered a lack of loyalty. Apparently Toscanini's acts towards the Italian government were not in question, but this omission of patriotic display branded him as a disloyal subject. The failure of the police to return the passport may cause the conductor to remain in Italy and forego his engagement in Vienna.

Toscanini has done a noble son's work by his beloved country. He achieved the heights in music. Everywhere he goes, everywhere he plays, Italy bears the honor of his achievement. He refused to compromise what he believed a perfect arrangement in the field of his own supreme talent, where he is a recognized authority. He refused to yield to views of men less skilled and less renowned that he, who decreed that they should proscribe the test of loyalty in his own profession.

The Italian conductor knows only too well that no surer means of dealing a death blow to musical and artistic appreciation is ever at hand than to surrender its idealism to those untrained and unskilled. He stands upon a principle. He no doubt would gladly arrange a concert with an appropriate program of patriotic airs; but he would rather lay down his baton, and silence his orchestra than stifle his music, in the hurrahs of men who have done far less than he to make their country's name renowned.

The incident is merely another illustration of the Fascist determination to bring all within Italy under the iron hand of the dictator. Politics and the state may be so dealt with for a time, and survive, even prosper, but music—music is the illusive force of the soul. In bondage it wanes and dies. It has expression only in real emotion, and finds little enthusiasm in the false reaction of a deliberately applied stimulus.

If the Fascisti must excite the people to honor their cause, and in so doing trample upon all that Italy has held most dear in musical supremacy, the party is proceeding upon a false premise.

...M

...Toscan- ...conduc- ...serious ...ive the ...Fascist ...of his ...of Dr. ...senting ...Banner" ...he Bos- ...ing the ...it the ...had no ...narches, ...ed peo- ...est de- ...of mu- ...e sup- ...levotion ...Ameri- ...sibilities ...prevent ...me vio- ...time of ...is said ...peace ...on and ...from ...obably ...more. ...nd all ...e wise ...etween ...ble of ...ven in ...n one ...of the ...letrac- ...a true ...music

THIS CLIPPING FROM
...NATI, O.
...QUIRER

MAY 26 1931

Corres...

Killed Self?

—International Newsreel Phot

JOHN N. GARFIELD.

Garfield, grandson of the marty President, James A. Garfield, believed to have shot himself t death. His body was found in home at Mentor, Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAY 27 1931

WOULD PROTEST TOSCANINI INCIDENT

Boston Symphony Conductor Says World Should Rise Against Treatment

PARIS, May 26 (INS) — Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill on engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country, and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf, should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

MUSSOLINI SOON TO RETURN TOSCANINI'S PASSPORT

ROME, May 26 (INS)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government, when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS

MAY 26 1931

TOSCANINI TO LEAVE MILAN

By International News Service.

ROME, May 26.—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthe mwas not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the Government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which h ehas been held a virtual prisoner.

Paris Musicians Protest Toscanini Treatment

PARIS, May 26 — (I. N. S.).—Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the Government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

MAY 29 1931

Koussevitsky Shuns Italy After Toscanini Affront

Boston Conductor Will Not Appear Until Incident Is Settled

PARIS, May 25 (UP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is adhering to his attempt to break his contract with La Scala Theater in Milan until the Fascist dispute with Arturo Toscanini, centering around the latter's refusal to play the royal march or the Fascist Hymn at Bologna earlier this month, has been "amicably settled."

Koussevitsky wrote to La Scala that it must postpone his engagement, saying that Toscanini belongs to the world, that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political gathering. He had been expected to appear at a festival at Milan June 7 to 17, conducting two concerts which would mark the musical high point of the season in Italy.

Officials of La Scala replied that Koussevitsky's proposal was impossible, since the concerts had already been announced. Koussevitsky sent another message insisting that the contract be broken and asking that he be allowed to make his appearance at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE

MAY 26 1931

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi at Toscanini Foes

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAY 26 1931

Toscanini Affair Is Called Disgrace

PARIS, May 25.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of tht Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected al attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep h engagement t play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by Fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

4/26 1931

Lewiston-A... Red

TOSC... FOR I...

Becau... the Fas... Bologna... ductor,... ciplined... placed... lance at... ing to a... city to... in whic...

Excep... play th... cert in... riot wh... street,... reason... governr... taken t... priving... man a... duct a... own co...

Serge... of the... tra, ha... the fes... Milan... on Sig... will be...

Mr.... to con... grams... Brahm... Prokof... may t...

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS SENTINEL

MAY 26 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ag... over the adverse publicity he receive... in this country from a speech by Gen... Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enoug... bluff to make the State Department bow t... him.

But how is Mussolini going to censo... American opinion of the Toscanini incident... That has revealed the Fascist dictatorshi... in all its cheap and cruel futility. Man... Americans, especially of the wealthy clas... which has tended to admire the dictator... are more enraged by the mistreatment o... the great conductor than by all the Fascis... murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and o... tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admira... tion and loyalty of tens of thousands o... music lovers in the U. S. They resent th... indignities which he has suffered from th... dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an im-anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change tht nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

MAY 26 1931

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25. — Declaring "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June Festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE

MAY 26 1931

KOUSSEVITSKY REFUSES TO PLAY AT MILAN.

Paris, May 26.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAY 27 1931

MUSSOLINI MUSIC.

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York City and on tour Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

MAY

MUSIC, IDEALS AND POLITICS

When the ideals of art come in conflict with the passions of politics, which shall give way? The question has been brought into prominence by the indignities and physical injuries suffered by Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest orchestral conductors, in his own country, Italy, for refusal to permit his programs to be marred, as he viewed it, by Fascist dictation. Toscanini has long been held in high esteem in America, formerly as director of its greatest opera company and of recent years as the chief conductor of New York's most important orchestra. And now another of the world's greatest conductors, a Russian, also highly esteemed as the head of one of the foremost orchestras of America, that of Boston, joins in the defense of art ideals against local passion

Serge Kousevitsky has announced that he will not keep his contract to conduct two performances of a great festival to be held at the Scala theater in Milan in June because of the "unbelievable outrage" committed against Toscanini. To a distressed cry from Milan that there was no sufficient reason for a breach of contract he replied that it was a question of principle, to him a sufficient reason. To a country like Italy, whose prestige in music is so great and whose composers and musicians have so long been held in international esteem, this conflict must present a harassing question.

To lovers of art generally it is a saddening affair. It is a break in the sense of universal brotherhood that art conveys. Kousevitsky also comes from a country which when it speaks with the voice of music gets a welcome into which no thought of geography or political or religious belief enters, for Russian music is music to which the heart of the world responds. In Russia, too, the field of art has been invaded by politics and attempts have been made to subordinate it especially in the case of the theater to propaganda purposes. Is America to become the place of asylum for its art idealists?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

...SICAL CHAUVINISM

...rom the Baltimore Sun.

...were at war, Arturo Toscan... ...ll his renown as a conduc... ...t get himself into serious ...y his refusal to give the ...lan anthem and the Fascist ...lace on the program of his ...n his native land.

...fortunate experience of Dr. ...c, who, though consenting ...The Star-Spangled Banner" ...he appeared with the Bos... ...ony Orchestra during the ...rved publicly that the ...national anthem had no ...orchestral performances, ...seriously an aroused peo... ...gard even the slightest de... ...m the formalities of mu... ...tism. Italians are sup... ...ve a more sincere devotion ... music's sake than Ameri... their musical sensibilities ...in all probability, prevent ...eacting with extreme vio... ...gularities in war time of ... which Toscanini is said ...

...has happened in peace ...r, Toscanini's action and ...ppings he suffered from ... in Bologna will probably ...lent" and nothing more. ...it ought to be and all ...ncipals if they are wise ...o be. Conflicts between ...avinism are capable of ...fortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.

Runs batted in—Dickey, Combs, Worthington, Brave... Hornsby, Cubs .... Arlett, Phillies .... Ruth, Yankees .... Cochrane, Athletics .... Simmons, Athletics ....

Totals 33 6 11 27 11 1
Earnshaw, p ..... — — — — — —
Holey, ss 4 0 0 0 1 0
McNair, 3b 4 0 0 0 1 0
Miller, rf 3 0 0 0 2 1
Foxx, 1b 4 1 2 4 1 0
Simmons, cf 3 0 2 1 0 0
Cochrane, c 4 1 0 10 0 0
Haas, cf 4 1 1 3 0 0
Bishop, 2b 3 0 1 3 6 0
Philadelphia— AB R H PO A E

Totals 39 5 12 24 9 0
Vetnert, p 0 0 0 0 1 0
Sherid, p 0 0 0 0 0 0
Lazzeri, xx 1 0 1 0 0 0

x—Ran for Ruth in 9th.
xx—Batted for Pipgras in 8th.

Big Six

(By The Asso...

Sherid. Umpires—... and Hildebrand.
Sherid 3 in 6 (Dlic...
Vetnert 0 in 1.
Struck out—By ... Straw 6. Hits—O...
2. Struck out—By ... balls—Off Bearsh... York 10; Phila...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
...NATI, O.
...QUIRER
...26 1931

Correspondent Killed Self?

—International Newsreel Phot

JOHN N. GARFIELD.

Garfield, grandson of the marty President, James A. Garfield, believed to have shot himself death. His body was found in home at Mentor, Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

WOULD PROTEST TOSCANINI INCIDENT

Boston Symphony Conductor Says World Should Rise Against Treatment

PARIS, May 26 (INS) — Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill on engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country, and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel in Toscanini's behalf, should do so," he said. "I believe that the whole cultured world should rise and protest."

MUSSOLINI SOON TO RETURN TOSCANINI'S PASSPORT

ROME, May 26 (INS)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government, when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan," he said, "who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution."

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS
MAY 26 1931

TOSCANINI TO LEAVE MILAN

By International News Service.

ROME, May 26.—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthe mwas not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the Government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which h ehas been held a virtual prisoner.

Paris Musicians Protest Toscanini Treatment

PARIS, May 26 — (I. N. S.).— Practically the entire musical world of Paris, led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the Government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
MAY 2[illegible] 1931

Koussevitsky Shuns Italy After Toscanini Affront

Boston Conductor Will Not Appear Until Incident Is Settled

PARIS, May 25 (UP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today he is adhering to his attempt to break his contract with La Scala Theater in Milan until the Fascist dispute with Arturo Toscanini, centering around the latter's refusal to play the royal march or the Fascist Hymn at Bologna earlier this month, has been "amicably settled."

Koussevitsky wrote to La Scala that it must postpone his engagement, saying that Toscanini belongs to the world, that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political gathering. He had been expected to appear at a festival at Milan June 7 to 17, conducting two concerts which would mark the musical high point of the season in Italy.

Officials of La Scala replied that Koussevitsky's proposal was impossible, since the concerts had already been announced. Koussevitsky sent another message insisting that the contract be broken and asking that he be allowed to make his appearance at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE
MAY 26 1931

Boston Symphony Chief Hurls Defi at Toscanini Foes

PARIS, May 25.—(UP)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful Fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by Fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the Fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said that the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE
MAY 26 1931

Toscanini Affair Is Called Disgrace

PARIS, May 25.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of tht Boston Symphony orchestra, today rejected al attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep hi engagement t play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

Koussevitsky.

Koussevitsky, who has been storming with indignation since the brutal attack by Fascists on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, in Bologna and his consequent imprisonment in his Milan residence, told Universal Service:

"Toscanini belongs to the world, not to one country.

"Whoever can raise a cudgel to protest in his behalf should do so."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAY 26 1931

Lewiston-A... Red

TOSC...
FOR ...

Becau... the Fas... Bologna... ductor, ... ciplined ... placed ... lance at ... ing to a ... city to ... in whic...

Excep... play th... cert in ... riot wh... street, ... reason ... governr... taken t... priving ... man a... duct a... own co...

Serg... of the ... tra, ha... the fes... Milan ... on Sig... will be...

Mr. ... to con... grams ... Brahm... Prokof... may t...

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS SENTINEL
MAY 26 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
MAY 26 1931

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said a concert is an artistic and not a political event.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
MAY 26 1931

Universal Service.

PARIS, May 25.—Declaring "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June Festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE
MAY 26 1931

KOUSSEVITSKY REFUSES TO PLAY AT MILAN.

Paris, May 26.—(Universal Service)—Declaring that "the Toscanini incident in Bologna and its continuation in Milan is a disgrace to the Italian government," Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today rejected all attempts to persuade him to reconsider his refusal to keep his engagement to play at La Scala in Milan in the June festival.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 27 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ag... over the adverse publicity he receive... in this country from a speech by Gen... Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enoug... bluff to make the State Department bow t... him.

But how is Mussolini going to censo... American opinion of the Toscanini incident... That has revealed the Fascist dictatorshi... in all its cheap and cruel futility. Man... Americans, especially of the wealthy class... which has tended to admire the dictator... are more enraged by the mistreatment of... the great conductor than by all the Fascist... murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on... tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admira... tion and loyalty of tens of thousands o... music lovers in the U. S. They resent the... indignities which he has suffered from the... dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an im-anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change tht nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

MUSSOL...

MUSSOLINI got ex... the adverse pu... country from a speed... marines. Il Duce ha... State Department bo...

But how is Mussoli... opinion of the Toscan... vealed the Fascist d... and cruel futility. ... of the wealthy class ... the dictator, are mo... ment of the great ... Fascist murders of ...

As a conductor in ... Signor Toscanini ha... loyalty of music love... nities which he has ... ship of his own cou...

Because he exercis... and as a musician ... demand to add a ta... concert at Bologna ... Fascist official. Mu... the subordinate, has... by withdrawing Tos... ing him a virtual pr...

Serge Koussevitsk... Symphony, has canc... in Milan in protest ... outrage against the ...

It is hardly to be ... boycotts and bad p... ture of the Mussolin... apparently, is that ... their self-respect an... from Fascist Italy.

...ualties gave wa... ...lest the passe... ...rriedly prod... ...ich they soug... ...ers of the wo...

...re unprepared ... ...timatum whe... ...release blank. ...w about getti... ...ake us to Vie... ...know. "If I ha... ...the way, you n... ...some one."

...t occurred to ... any one wou... a wrecked ... ne for a rest... When the ... y fell over ... other ship.

...r Male Passe... ...ols and her fo... ...d aboard it. ... the American

North country

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
MAY ...

MUSIC, IDEALS AND POLITICS

When the ideals of art come in conflict with the passions of politics, which shall give way? The question has been brought into prominence by the indignities and physical injuries suffered by Arturo Toscanini, one of the world's greatest orchestral conductors, in his own country, Italy, for refusal to permit his programs to be marred, as he viewed it, by Fascist dictation. Toscanini has long been held in high esteem in America, formerly as director of its greatest opera company and of recent years as the chief conductor of New York's most important orchestra. And now another of the world's greatest conductors, a Russian, also highly esteemed as the head of one of the foremost orchestras of America, that of Boston, joins in the defense of art ideals against local passion

Serge Kousevitsky has announced that he will not keep his contract to conduct two performances of a great festival to be held at the Scala theater in Milan in June because of the "unbelievable outrage" committed against Toscanini. To a distressed cry from Milan that there was no sufficient reason for a breach of contract he replied that it was a question of principle, to him a sufficient reason. To a country like Italy, whose prestige in music is so great and whose composers and musicians have so long been held in international esteem, this conflict must present a harassing question.

To lovers of art generally it is a saddening affair. It is a break in the sense of universal brotherhood that art conveys. Kousevitsky also comes from a country which when it speaks with the voice of music gets a welcome into which no thought of geography or political or religious belief enters, for Russian music is music to which the heart of the world responds. In Russia, too, the field of art has been invaded by politics and attempts have been made to subordinate it especially in the case of the theater to propaganda purposes. Is America to become the place of asylum for ... art idealists?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

From the Baltimore Sun.

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.

Big Six

(By The Asso...

...Runs batted in—Dickey, Combs, Worthington, Brave... Philadelphia ..... 201 100 02x—6 ... New York ..... 020 000 030—5 ... Totals 33 6 11 27 11 1

...Earnshaw, p ..... 4 0 0 0 1 0 ... McNair, ss ..... 4 0 0 0 2 1 ... Miller, rf ..... 3 0 2 1 1 0 ... Foxx, 1b ..... 4 1 2 4 0 0 ... Simmons, cf ..... 3 0 1 3 0 0 ... Cochrane, c ..... 4 1 1 3 0 0 ... Bishop, 2b ..... 4 2 3 6 0 0 ... Haas, cf ..... 4 2 2 0 7 0 ... Philadelphia— AB R H PO A E

...xx—Batted for Pipgras in 8th. ... Totals ..... 39 6 12 24 9 0 ... Welnert, p ..... 0 0 0 0 1 0 ... Sherid, p ..... 0 0 0 0 0 0 ... Lazzeri, xx 1 0 0 0 0 0

...Sherid 3 in 9th. ... Welnert 6 in 9th. ... Sherid 3 in 0 (pitched ball)—Off Earnshaw 6, Welnert 0, Sherid 3. ... 2. Struck out—By Earnshaw 6, Welnert 3, Sherid 0. ... Umpires—Messrs. Hildebrand, ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

MAY 27 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
HERALD

MAY

Musical World Over Tos

PARIS, May 27.—(Spl)—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he suffered when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for later appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

ROME, May 27.—(Spl)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan, who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution," said Mussolini.

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS SCIMITAR

28 1931

Mussolini Music

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST

MAY 28 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Ill Duce had enough bluff to make the state department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
AUBURN, N. Y.

MAY 28 1931

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has cancelled a concert at Milan on account of the rough treatment accorded to Toscanini when he refused to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. The reason given is that "a concert is an artistic not a political gathering." Which is a good reason; the trouble is to the Fascisti all things these days are political. The Fascist psychology is a typical "war psychology"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

MAY 29 1931

Fascism's Blunder

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled a concert orchestra engagement in Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini in Bologna for exercising his right as a free man and a musician in refusing to obey commands to play the Fascist anthem at his concert. Koussevitsky calls the treatment of Toscanini an "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

Since Toscanini was beaten by Fascists at Bologna, he has been besieged by Fascists at his Milan residence, his telegrams and letters have been intercepted, his telephone calls censored, and his passport revoked. "As a conductor in New York City and on tour," says the New York World-Telegram, "Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country."

It is of course true that Fascism has made a grave error. It has displayed a spirit of narrow patriotism which almost always leads to regrettable consequences. But before Americans condemn the outbreak of the Fascists too severely, it will be well for them to recall the treatment accorded to Fritz Kreisler in this country during the World War. To be sure, Italy is not now at war and Toscanini is not a citizen of an "enemy" race. That, perhaps, makes a difference.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

GABRILOWITSCH FLOUTS MILAN POST

Detroit Conductor Is Stirred by Attack on Toscanini.

Berlin, May 29.—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD

MAY 2 1931

DETROIT CONDUCTER REBUKES ITALY FOR INSULT TO TOSCANINI

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of Ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory tha nany man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

29 1931

GABRILOTWITSCH DROPS SCALA, TOO

Detroit Conductor Cancels Concerts Because of Fascist Treatment of Toscanini

WANTS 'RUFFIANS' PUNISHED

BERLIN, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted upon Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

29 1931

TOSCANINI IS SUPPORTED BY GABRILOWITSCH

Berlin—(AP)— Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said of the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any other man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, canceled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

MAY 29 1931

Gabrilowitsch Cancels Engagement in Italy

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

MAY 27 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
HERALD

Musical World Over Tos

PARIS, May 27.—(Spl)—Practically the entire musical world of Paris led by Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, voiced its indignation today at the treatment in Italy of Arturo Toscanini.

Toscanini, leader of the New York symphony orchestra, has been held a virtual prisoner in his Milan home since he refused to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert. Because of injuries he suffered when he was attacked by the audience, he was forced to cancel engagements for later appearances in Vienna.

Koussevitsky, who refused to fulfill an engagement in Italy because of his wrath at the government's treatment of Toscanini, said he believed artists belong to the world and not to one country and should not be persecuted whatever their political beliefs.

ROME, May 27.—(Spl)—Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York philharmonic orchestra, today was expected to receive permission to leave Milan, after assuring the prefect there that his refusal to play the Fascist national anthem at a recent concert was an unintentional slight.

Toscanini, who was attacked by the audience, following his refusal to play the anthem at the Bologna concert, said the anthem was not good music. However, it was considered as a slight to the government when it was remembered that he played the American and British airs at his last concert in London.

Should Toscanini assure the prefect that the slight was unintentional his passport will be returned and he will be allowed to depart from his Milan home, in which he has been held a virtual prisoner.

Premier Mussolini refused to make a state affair of the incident, which has aroused critical feeling in many parts of Europe and the United States.

"The affair is being handled by the prefect of Milan, who must inquire into all the details and arrive at his own solution," said Mussolini.

The conductor is recovering from injuries to his head and right arm, suffered when he was attacked.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS SCIMITAR

2[illegible] 1931

Mussolini Music

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST

MAY 28 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the Marines. Ill Duce had enough bluff to make the state department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
AUBURN, N. Y.

MAY 28 1931

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has cancelled a concert at Milan on account of the rough treatment accorded to Toscanini when he refused to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. The reason given is that "a concert is an artistic not a political gathering." Which is a good reason; the trouble is to the Fascisti all things these days are political. The Fascist psychology is a typical "war psychology"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

MAY 29 1931

Fascism's Blunder

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has cancelled a concert orchestra engagement in Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini in Bologna for exercising his right as a free man and a musician in refusing to obey commands to play the Fascist anthem at his concert. Koussevitsky calls the treatment of Toscanini an "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

Since Toscanini was beaten by Fascists at Bologna, he has been besieged by Fascists at his Milan residence, his telegrams and letters have been intercepted, his telephone calls censored, and his passport revoked. "As a conductor in New York City and on tour," says the New York World-Telegram, "Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country."

It is of course true that Fascism has made a grave error. It has displayed a spirit of narrow patriotism which almost always leads to regrettable consequences. But before Americans condemn the outbreak of the Fascists too severely, it will be well for them to recall the treatment accorded to Fritz Kreisler in this country during the World War. To be sure, Italy is not now at war and Toscanini is not a citizen of an "enemy" race. That, perhaps, makes a difference.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

GABRILOWITSCH FLOUTS MILAN POST

Detroit Conductor Is Stirred by Attack on Toscanini.

Berlin, May 29.—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD

MAY [illegible]

DETROIT CONDUCTER REBUKES ITALY FOR INSULT TO TOSCANINI

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of Ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory tha nany man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

[illegible]

GABRILOTWITSCH DROPS SCALA, TOO

Detroit Conductor Cancels Concerts Because of Fascist Treatment of Toscanini

WANTS 'RUFFIANS' PUNISHED

BERLIN, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted upon Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

2[illegible]

TOSCANINI IS SUPPORTED BY GABRILOWITSCH

Berlin—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said of the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any other man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, canceled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

MAY 29 1931

Gabrilowitsch Cancels Engagement in Italy

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

210

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH WILL NOT APPEAR IN MILAN

Berlin, May 29.—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
MAY 29 1931

Toscanini Attack Arouses Wrath Of Gabrilowitsch

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of Ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused the man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
MAY 29 1931

Conductor Declines to Appear at Milan Becaus Of Toscanini Incide

BERLIN, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 29 1931

Stravinsky Has New Concerto

Igor Stravinsky, according to a report from Antibes, France, is completing a violin concerto which is to have ... performance ... part season with Samuel Dushkin as soloist. Mr. Dushkin will introduce the concerto at a concert of the Berlin Philharmonic under Bruno Walter's direction on October 9 and will play it for the first time in America with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on New Year's Day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL
MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH DECLINES TO APPEAR IN BERLIN AS RESULT OF FASCIST TILT

BERLIN —(AP)— Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
MAY 30 1931

EISERHARDT BACKS STAND OF TOSCANINI

Conductor Within Rights in Refusing Fascist Music, Says U. R. Professor

When Toscanini, noted conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, while on a recent visit to Bologna, refused the request of Fascist officials to play the Fascist hymn or the royal march as a part of a concert program, he was entirely within his rights, says Dr. Ewald Eiserhardt, professor of German and lecturer on the history of art at the University of Rochester.

Toscanini was held a virtual prisoner in his house at Bologna after his refusal to have the hymn and march played in a concert engagement in Bologna. He said that to do so would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

Right Point of View

"Toscanini's point of view is the right one," Dr. Eiserhardt said in commenting yesterday on the incident. "Art and science are international, and every effort to drive science and art into nationalism deteriorates them. We ought to declare that Toscanini and Koussevitsky should be allowed to stand up for their own principles. What is true of art and science is also true of religion and philosophy."

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon hearing of the incident, refused to fill an engagement to conduct at the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. He asserted that the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini was an offense against the whole artistic

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
MAY 30 1931

TOSCANINI DEFENDED

Gabrilowitsch declines to appear at La Scala in Milan

Berlin, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Tosconini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 31 1931

...rchbishop Church who, once an Alpine mountain-climber, still retains much of the strength of his youth, intends to celebrate his birthday quietly in the midst of a few relatives and the Papal Court.

Telegrams and cables of congratulation, including many from the United States, have begun to arrive. Cardinal Pacelli, Papal Secretary of State, will reply to them on the Pontiff's behalf.

Tomorrow will see the papal flag, yellow and white with the tiara and crossed keys in gold centred upon it, flying from all the edifices of the little Pontifical city. The flag of the Swiss Guards will wave from their station near the great bronze door to the right of St. Peter's. The Swiss, together with the Palatine Guard and the papal gendarmes, will wear full-dress uniforms.

The Pope will celebrate mass in his private chapel in the presence of several relatives, including his niece, Marchesa Persichetti Ugolini, wife of the Minister of Santo Domingo to the Holy See. Missing at the gathering, however, will be a brother of the Pontiff, who died during the last year.

Pius XI is in the tenth year of his reign. Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago, who saw him recently, found him in excellent health.

For a man of 74, the Pope is unusually active. Each day he receives a dozen Prelates or distinguished visitors in private audience, and from 200 to 2,000 in public audience. He dictates correspondence in Italian, French, German and Latin. He keeps in touch with developments and movements, political, economic, religious in all parts of the world and amazes visiting Bishops with the extent of his information.

Although the Prelates of his house-

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAY 31 1931

Italy's Music Row

THE quarrel of Italian Fascists with ARTURO TOSCANINI has apparently come to an end, and we observe with pleasure that the violence to which he was subjected was not official.

It will be recalled that about two weeks ago, SIGNOR TOSCANINI was mobbed by Italian patriots because he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert. The maestro, who is himself a man of spirit, was set upon and rather severely shaken up in a scuffle with his opponents.

Immediately there were world-wide denunciations and fears that the Fascist government would take cognizance of the affair and restrict the movements of the great orchestra conductor. SERGEI KOUSSE... of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issued a strong defense of TOSCANINI and reproved the Fascists for their behavior. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra declined to conduct a series of concerts in Milan because of his "outraged feelings" over the incident.

Now it has been authoritatively announced that SIGNOR TOSCANINI is under no duress whatever and that the cancellation of his recent concerts was occasioned entirely by his physical condition.

Just why the famous Italian conductor refused to play the Fascist anthem is not known. He has never been particularly favorable to the ruling party of Italy, but his attitude of the past was one of artistic indifference, if not disdain. It appears to us, however, that he could have played what his audience wanted and gracefully escaped a scene, without doing violence to his artistic standards.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
MAY 29 1931

...maestro ...ough to ...llowed it ...ananas—

GABRILOWITSCH CANCELS PLAN TO PLAY FOR FASCIST 'RUFFIANS'

Refuses to Appear at La Scala Because of Toscanini's Treatment; Scores Abuse.

BERLIN, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined toappear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

The Toscanini Fracas

In connection with the conflict between Toscanini and the Fascist authorities in Italy, some sidelights have cropped up which merit mention.

Koussevitzky, in protest at the Bologna incident, which he calls "a disgrace to the Italian Government," refused to keep his engagement to conduct at La Scala next month. The extreme view and action of Koussevitzky is tactless and even foolish, and not conducive to helping Toscanini. The present political powers in Italy constitute a de facto and recognized government, which certainly has the right to issue orders and to enforce them if necessary. Toscanini is an Italian citizen, and by his act must have known that he courted discipline. That is strictly a matter, therefore, between Toscanini and the Fascisti. However, the injection of Koussevitzky into the affair seems absolutely gratuitous and unnecessary. A Russian, he probably does not love the Soviet rule in his own native country, but it is doubtful whether he would refuse to play its present national anthem were he asked to conduct it in Russia.

Walter Damrosch, too, puts a finger in the pie, by issuing a statement quoted as follows in the daily papers:

"Naturally we, as Americans, do not desire to interfere with the politics of another country, but generally speaking as a musician, Italy is not at war and there is no particular reason for frequent repetition of her national hymn or song symbolizing Fascism.

"Toscanini was absolutely within his rights to refuse to play either of those tunes on this occasion. It is possible that his aggressors knew his lack of sympathy with the aims of Fascism and therefore used his opposition to provoke a quarrel.

"If Italy were at war it would be different. When a nation is in danger the national anthem is a symbol of patriotism and is a great and wonderful instrument for inflaming patriotism. In time of peace the perpetual playing of national anthems is a nuisance."

There is more sense in the Damrosch attitude than in that of Koussevitzky. And yet, the former should know that some countries make a practise of insisting on the playing of the national anthem at all public entertainments. In England, the custom has been observed for a great many years, at concerts, theatres, cafes, restaurants, music halls and dances.

Damrosch is right in declaring the observance to be a nuisance in peace times. A citizen may be deeply patriotic and yet not pleased at the necessity of jumping up at sundry times and places, and listening to the anthem or joining in its vocal expression. It is safe to say that when this is done in America in these peace years, the average enforced standee and vocalist feels secretly resentful, and regards the ceremony as a decided "nuisance."

When the Bologna contretemps was first cabled to America, the MUSICAL COURIER dubbed the whole affair "a tempest in a teapot."

Read what Mussolini, head of the Fascists, says to Universal Service, regarding the attitude of the Italian Government toward the Toscanini happenings in Bologna and Milan: "We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication and we have no intention of making one. The affair is being handled by the Prefect of Milan, who must arrive at his own solution."

That seems to close the whole matter, except, that if Toscanini had played the anthem he would not have received a trouncing and would not even have stultified himself as a musician, despite the fact that he looks upon the Fascist anthem as just "poor music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
MAY 29 19...

Detroit Music Conductor To Pass Up Milan

Treatment Of Toscanini There Brings Move By Gabrilowitsch

BERLIN, May 29: (A. P.) — Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

210

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH WILL NOT APPEAR IN MILAN

Berlin, May 29.—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

MAY 29 1931

Toscanini Attack Arouses Wrath Of Gabrilowitsch

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of Ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused the man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

MAY 29 1931

Conductor Declines to Appear at Milan Becaus Of Toscanini Incide

BERLIN, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 29 1931

Stravinsky Has New Concerto

Igor Stravinsky, according to a report from Antibes, France, is completing a violin concerto which is to have its first performance next season with Samuel Dushkin as soloist. Mr. Dushkin will introduce the concerto at a concert of the Berlin Philharmonic under Bruno Walter's direction on October 9 and will play it for the first time in America with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on New Year's Day.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL
MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH DECLINES TO APPEAR IN BERLIN AS RESULT OF FASCIST TILT

BERLIN —(AP)— Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

MAY 30 1931

EISERHARDT BACKS STAND OF TOSCANINI

Conductor Within Rights in Refusing Fascist Music, Says U. R. Professor

When Toscanini, noted conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, while on a recent visit to Bologna, refused the request of Fascist officials to play the Fascist hymn or the royal march as a part of a concert program, he was entirely within his rights, says Dr. Ewald Eiserhardt, professor of German and lecturer on the history of art at the University of Rochester.

Toscanini was held a virtual prisoner in his house at Bologna after his refusal to have the hymn and march played in a concert engagement in Bologna. He said that to do so would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

Right Point of View

"Toscanini's point of view is the right one," Dr. Eiserhardt said in commenting yesterday on the incident. "Art and science are international, and every effort to drive science and art into nationalism deteriorates them. We ought to declare that Toscanini and Koussevitsky should be allowed to stand up for their own principles. What is true of art and science is also true of religion and philosophy."

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon hearing of the incident, refused to fill an engagement to conduct at the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. He asserted that the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini was an offense against the whole artistic w

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER

MAY 30 1931

TOSCANINI DEFENDED

Gabrilowitsch declines to appear at La Scala in Milan

Berlin, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Tosconini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 29 1931

atholic Church who, once an Alpine mountain-climber, still retains much of the strength of his youth, intends to celebrate his birthday quietly in the midst of a few relatives and the Papal Court.

Telegrams and cables of congratulation, including many from the United States, have begun to arrive. Cardinal Pacelli, Papal Secretary of State, will reply to them on the Pontiff's behalf.

Tomorrow will see the papal flag, yellow and white with the tiara and crossed keys in gold centred upon it, flying from all the edifices of the little Pontifical city. The flag of the Swiss Guards will wave from their station near the great bronze door to the right of St. Peter's. The Swiss, together with the Palatine Guard and the papal gendarmes, will wear full-dress uniforms.

The Pope will celebrate mass in his private chapel in the presence of several relatives, including his niece, Marchesa Persichetti Ugolini, wife of the Minister of Santo Domingo to the Holy See. Missing at the gathering, however, will be a brother of the Pontiff, who died during the last year.

Pius XI is in the tenth year of his reign. Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago, who saw him recently, found him in excellent health.

For a man of 74, the Pope is unusually active. Each day he receives a dozen Prelates or distinguished visitors in private audience, and from 200 to 2,000 in public audience. He dictates correspondence in Italian, French, German and Latin. He keeps in touch with developments and movements, political, economic, religious in all parts of the world and amazes visiting Bishops with the extent of his information.

Although the Prelates of his house-

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Italy's Music Row

THE quarrel of Italian Fascists with ARTURO TOSCANINI has apparently come to an end, and we observe with pleasure that the violence to which he was subjected was not official.

It will be recalled that about two weeks ago SIGNOR TOSCANINI was mobbed by Italian patriots because he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert. The maestro, who is himself a man of spirit, was set upon and rather severely shaken up in a scuffle with his opponents.

Immediately there were world-wide denunciations and fears that the Fascist government would take cognizance of the affair and restrict the movements of the guest orchestra conductor. SERGEI KOUSS... Boston Symphony Orchestra issued a strong defense of TOSCANINI and reproved the Fascists for their behavior. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra declined to conduct a series of concerts in Milan because of his "outraged feelings" over the incident.

Now it has been authoritatively announced that SIGNOR TOSCANINI is under no duress whatever and that the cancellation of his recent concerts was occasioned entirely by his physical condition.

Just why the famous Italian conductor refused to play the Fascist anthem is not known. He has never been particularly favorable to the ruling party of Italy, but his attitude of the past was one of artistic indifference, if not disdain. It appears to us, however, that he could have played what his audience wanted and gracefully escaped a scene, without doing violence to his artistic standards.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH CANCELS PLAN TO PLAY FOR FASCIST 'RUFFIANS'

Refuses to Appear at La Scala Because of Toscanini's Treatment; Scores Abuse.

BERLIN, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined toappear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

is put out of his mind.

Courier

The Toscanini Fracas

In connection with the conflict between Toscanini and the Fascist authorities in Italy, some sidelights have cropped up which merit mention.

Koussevitzky, in protest at the Bologna incident, which he calls "a disgrace to the Italian Government," refused to keep his engagement to conduct at La Scala next month. The extreme view and action of Koussevitzky is tactless and even foolish, and not conducive to helping Toscanini. The present political powers in Italy constitute a de facto and recognized government, which certainly has the right to issue orders and to enforce them if necessary. Toscanini is an Italian citizen, and by his act must have known that he courted discipline. That is strictly a matter, therefore, between Toscanini and the Fascisti. However, the injection of Koussevitzky into the affair seems absolutely gratuitous and unnecessary. A Russian, he probably does not love the Soviet rule in his own native country, but it is doubtful whether he would refuse to play its present national anthem were he asked to conduct it in Russia.

Walter Damrosch, too, puts a finger in the pie, by issuing a statement quoted as follows in the daily papers:

"Naturally we, as Americans, do not desire to interfere with the politics of another country, but generally speaking as a musician, Italy is not at war and there is no particular reason for frequent repetition of her national hymn or song symbolizing Fascism.

"Toscanini was absolutely within his rights to refuse to play either of those tunes on this occasion. It is possible that his aggressors knew his lack of sympathy with the aims of Fascism and therefore used his opposition to provoke a quarrel.

"If Italy were at war it would be different. When a nation is in danger the national anthem is a symbol of patriotism and is a great and wonderful instrument for inflaming patriotism. In time of peace the perpetual playing of national anthems is a nuisance"

There is more sense in the Damrosch attitude than in that of Koussevitzky. And yet, the former should know that some countries make a practise of insisting on the playing of the national anthem at all public entertainments. In England, the custom has been observed for a great many years, at concerts, theatres, cafes, restaurants, music halls and dances.

Damrosch is right in declaring the observance to be a nuisance in peace times. A citizen may be deeply patriotic and yet not pleased at the necessity of jumping up at sundry times and places, and listening to the anthem or joining in its vocal expression. It is safe to say that when this is done in America in these peace years, the average enforced standee and vocalist feels secretly resentful, and regards the ceremony as a decided "nuisance."

When the Bologna contretemps was first cabled to America, the MUSICAL COURIER dubbed the whole affair "a tempest in a teapot."

Read what Mussolini, head of the Fascists, says to Universal Service, regarding the attitude of the Italian Government toward the Toscanini happenings in Bologna and Milan: "We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication and we have no intention of making one. The affair is being handled by the Prefect of Milan, who must arrive at his own solution."

That seems to close the whole matter, except, that if Toscanini had played the anthem he would not have received a trouncing and would not even have stultified himself as a musician, despite the fact that he looks upon the Fascist anthem as just "poor music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 29 1931

Detroit Music Conductor To Pass Up Milan

Treatment Of Toscanini There Brings Move By Gabrilowitsch

BERLIN, May 29. (A. P.) — Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

210

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH WILL NOT APPEAR IN MILAN

Berlin, May 29. (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

MAY 29 1931

Toscanini Attack Arouses Wrath Of Gabrilowitsch

Berlin, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of Ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused the man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

MAY 29 1931

Conductor Declines to Appear at Milan Becaus Of Toscanini Incide

BERLIN, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL
MAY 29 1931

GABRILOWITSCH DECLINES TO APPEAR IN BERLIN AS RESULT OF FASCIST TILT

BERLIN —(AP)— Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

MAY 30 1931

EISERHARDT BACKS STAND OF TOSCANINI

Conductor Within Rights in Refusing Fascist Music, Says U. R. Professor

When Toscanini, noted conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, while on a recent visit to Bologna, refused the request of Fascist officials to play the Fascist hymn or the royal march as a part of a concert program, he was entirely within his rights, says Dr. Ewald Eiserhardt, professor of German and lecturer on the history of art at the University of Rochester.

Toscanini was held a virtual prisoner in his house at Bologna after his refusal to have the hymn and march played in a concert engagement in Bologna. He said that to do so would spoil the whole artistic effect of his concert.

Right Point of View

"Toscanini's point of view is the right one," Dr. Eiserhardt said in commenting yesterday on the incident. "Art and science are international, and every effort to drive science and art into nationalism deteriorates them. We ought to declare that Toscanini and Koussevitsky should be allowed to stand up for their own principles. What is true of art and science is also true of religion and philosophy."

Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon hearing of the incident, refused to fill an engagement to conduct at the festival at the Scala Theater in Milan in protest against the attack on Signor Toscanini. He asserted that the "unbelievable outrage against Toscanini was an offense against the whole artistic world."

Berlin, May 29 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Tosconini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

MAY 31 1931

athone Church who, once an Alpine mountain-climber, still retains much of the strength of his youth, intends to celebrate his birthday quietly in the midst of a few relatives and the Papal Court.

Telegrams and cables of congratulation, including many from the United States, have begun to arrive. Cardinal Pacelli, Papal Secretary of State, will reply to them on the Pontiff's behalf.

Tomorrow will see the papal flag, yellow and white with the tiara and crossed keys in gold centred upon it, flying from all the edifices of the little Pontifical city. The flag of the Swiss Guards will wave from their station near the great bronze door to the right of St. Peter's. The Swiss, together with the Palatine Guard and the papal gendarmes, will wear full-dress uniforms.

The Pope will celebrate mass in his private chapel in the presence of several relatives, including his niece, Marchesa Persichetti Ugolini, wife of the Minister of Santo Domingo to the Holy See. Missing at the gathering, however, will be a brother of the Pontiff, who died during the last year.

Pius XI is in the tenth year of his reign. Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago, who saw him recently, found him in excellent health.

For a man of 74, the Pope is unusually active. Each day he receives a dozen Prelates or distinguished visitors in private audience, and from 200 to 2,000 in public audience. He dictates correspondence in Italian, French, German and Latin. He keeps in touch with developments and movements, political, economic, religious in all parts of the world and amazes visiting Bishops with the extent of his information.

Although the Prelates of his house-

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Italy's Music Row

THE quarrel of Italian Fascists with ARTURO TOSCANINI has apparently come to an end, and we observe with pleasure that the violence of which he was subjected was not official.

It will be recalled that about two weeks ago SIGNOR TOSCANINI was mobbed by Italian patriots because he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert. The maestro, who is himself a man of spirit, was set upon and rather severely shaken up in a scuffle with his opponents.

Immediately there were world-wide denunciations and fears that the Fascist government would take cognizance of the affair and restrict the movements of the great orchestra conductor. SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY of the Boston Symphony Orchestra issued a strong defense of TOSCANINI and reproved the Fascists for their behavior. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra declined to conduct a series of concerts in Milan because of his "outraged feelings" over the incident.

Now it has been authoritatively announced that SIGNOR TOSCANINI is under no duress whatever and that the cancellation of his recent concerts was occasioned entirely by his physical condition.

Just why the famous Italian conductor refused to play the Fascist anthem is not known. He has never been particularly favorable to the ruling party of Italy, but his attitude of the past was one of artistic indifference, if not disdain. It appears to us, however, that he could have played what his audience wanted and gracefully escaped a scene, without doing violence to his artistic standards.

As H. I. PHILLIPS suggests, the maestro might have had sense of humor enough to have played the Fascist hymn and followed it immediately with Yes, We Have No Bananas—of an Italian equivalent.

is put out of his mind.

Courier

The Toscanini Fracas

In connection with the conflict between Toscanini and the Fascist authorities in Italy, some sidelights have cropped up which merit mention.

Koussevitzky, in protest at the Bologna incident, which he calls "a disgrace to the Italian Government," refused to keep his engagement to conduct at La Scala next month. The extreme view and action of Koussevitzky is tactless and even foolish, and not conducive to helping Toscanini. The present political powers in Italy constitute a de facto and recognized government, which certainly has the right to issue orders and to enforce them if necessary. Toscanini is an Italian citizen, and by his act must have known that he courted discipline. That is strictly a matter, therefore, between Toscanini and the Fascisti. However, the injection of Koussevitzky into the affair seems absolutely gratuitous and unnecessary. A Russian, he probably does not love the Soviet rule in his own native country, but it is doubtful whether he would refuse to play its present national anthem were he asked to conduct it in Russia.

Walter Damrosch, too, puts a finger in the pie, by issuing a statement quoted as follows in the daily papers:

"Naturally we, as Americans, do not desire to interfere with the politics of another country, but generally speaking as a musician, Italy is not at war and there is no particular reason for frequent repetition of her national hymn or song symbolizing Fascism.

"Toscanini was absolutely within his rights to refuse to play either of those tunes on this occasion. It is possible that his aggressors knew his lack of sympathy with the aims of Fascism and therefore used his opposition to provoke a quarrel.

"If Italy were at war it would be different. When a nation is in danger the national anthem is a symbol of patriotism and is a great and wonderful instrument for inflaming patriotism. In time of peace the perpetual playing of national anthems is a nuisance."

There is more sense in the Damrosch attitude than in that of Koussevitzky. And yet, the former should know that some countries make a practise of insisting on the playing of the national anthem at all public entertainments. In England, the custom has been observed for a great many years, at concerts, theatres, cafes, restaurants, music halls and dances.

Damrosch is right in declaring the observance to be a nuisance in peace times. A citizen may be deeply patriotic and yet not pleased at the necessity of jumping up at sundry times and places, and listening to the anthem or joining in its vocal expression. It is safe to say that when this is done in America in these peace years, the average enforced standee and vocalist feels secretly resentful, and regards the ceremony as a decided "nuisance."

When the Bologna contretemps was first cabled to America, the MUSICAL COURIER dubbed the whole affair "a tempest in a teapot."

Read what Mussolini, head of the Fascists, says to Universal Service, regarding the attitude of the Italian Government toward the Toscanini happenings in Bologna and Milan: "We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication and we have no intention of making one. The affair is being handled by the Prefect of Milan, who must arrive at his own solution."

That seems to close the whole matter, except, that if Toscanini had played the anthem he would not have received a trouncing and would not even have stultified himself as a musician, despite the fact that he looks upon the Fascist anthem as just "poor music."

concert of the Berlin Philharmonic under Bruno Walter's direction on October 9 and will play it for the first time in America with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky on New Year's Day.

NCELS PLAN SCIST 'RUFFIANS'

Scala Because of Toscanini's Treatment; Scores Abuse.

BERLIN, May 29 (AP).—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined toappear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 29 1931

Detroit Music Conductor To Pass Up Milan

Treatment Of Toscanini There Brings Move By Gabrilowitsch

BERLIN, May 29. (A. P.) — Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declined to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 25 1931

It Seems to Me
by
HEYWOOD BROUN

(Copyright, 1931, by The New York Telegram Corp.)

IN his address in celebration of the anniversary of the Red Cross, President Hoover took occasion again to harp on the value of private initiative. He spoke of Clara Barton and said that she did not look to governmental agencies for support in her work.

"Governments are always too slow," said Mr. Hoover, "frequently too short-sighted to meet the sudden sharp demands of critical emergencies in human suffering. She depended on the instant response of the individual human heart to finance the instant need. This gave her the flexibility and freedom of private initiative in her work."

It may be true that governments are too slow in their response to the need of economic relief. But it seems to me a curious thing that the Chief Executive of the United States should point, almost with pride, to this fact. If governments have been in the past too slow and too short-sighted it would seem an excellent thing to do something about it. There is no good reason why they should be laggards forever. Even a State can learn celerity. And compassion, too, for that matter.

Atomic Energy and the Whole.

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the State. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theatre. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

A Black Shirt Blacklist.

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAY 26 1931

IT SEEMS TO ME -:- By HEYWOOD BROUN

"If governments have been in the past too slow and too short-sighted it would seem an excellent thing to do something about it."

IN his address in celebration of the anniversary of the Red Cross, President Hoover took occasion again to harp on the value of private initiative. He spoke of Clara Barton and said that she did not look to governmental agencies for support in her work.

"Governments are always too slow," said Mr. Hoover, "frequently too short-sighted to meet the sudden sharp demands of critical emergencies in human suffering. She depended on the instant response of the individual human heart to finance the instant need. This gave her the flexibility and freedom of private initiative in her work."

It may be true that governments are too slow in their response to the need of economic relief. But it seems to me a curious thing that the Chief Executive of the United States should point, almost with pride, to this fact. If governments have been in the past too slow and too short-sighted it would seem an excellent thing to do something about it. There is no good reason why they should be laggards forever. Even a state can learn celerity. And compassion, too, for that matter.

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced thru dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
MAY 27 1931

It Seems To Me

Ideas and opinions expressed in this column are those of one of America's most interesting writers, and are presented without regard to their agreement or disagreement with the editorial attitude of this paper—The Editor.

By HEYWOOD BROUN
Copyright, 19 for The Pittsburgh Press

NEW YORK

Atomic Energy

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

A Black Shirt Blacklist

IT IS HEARTENING to hear th Serge Koussevitzky has refused t fill a concert engagement at Mila as a protest against the treatment o Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. Amer-

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
MAY 26 1931

It Seems To Me

By Heywood Broun

Atomic Energy and the Whole.

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the State. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

A Black Shirt Blacklist.

IT IS heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

* * *

th

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

IT SEEMS TO ME

By HEYWOOD BROUN

HEARTENING to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment anini.

manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the con-Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of prin-th me, and that is sufficient reason."

well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott e part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art.
n singers, American painters, architects and authors should land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he assed and slighted.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS
MAY 27 1931

211

IT SEEMS TO ME

Ideas and opinions expressed in this column are those of one of America's most interesting writers and are presented without regard to their agreement or disagreement with the editorial attitude of this paper.—The Editor.

By HEYWOOD BROUN

* * *

Atomic Energy

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the president are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced thru dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Artruro Toscanini beat time.

Mussini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

Black Shirt Blacklist

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

* * *

A House of Refuge

BIA UNI

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAY 25 1931

It Seems to Me
by
HEYWOOD BROUN

(Copyright, 1931, by The New York Telegram Corp.)

IN his address in celebration of the anniversary of the Red Cross, President Hoover took occasion again to harp on the value of private initiative. He spoke of Clara Barton and said that she did not look to governmental agencies for support in her work.

"Governments are always too slow," said Mr. Hoover, "frequently too short-sighted to meet the sudden sharp demands of critical emergencies in human suffering. She depended on the instant response of the individual human heart to finance the instant need. This gave her the flexibility and freedom of private initiative in her work."

It may be true that governments are too slow in their response to the need of economic relief. But it seems to me a curious thing that the Chief Executive of the United States should point, almost with pride, to this fact. If governments have been in the past too slow and too short-sighted it would seem an excellent thing to do something about it. There is no good reason why they should be laggards forever. Even a State can learn celerity. And compassion, too, for that matter.

Atomic Energy and the Whole.

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the State. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persetution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theatre. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

A Black Shirt Blacklist.

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
MAY 27 1931

It Seems To Me

Ideas and opinions expressed in this column are those of one of America's most interesting writers, and are presented without regard to their agreement or disagreement with the editorial attitude of this paper—The Editor.

By HEYWOOD BROUN
Copyright, 19 for The Pittsburgh Press

NEW YORK

Atomic Energy

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

A Black Shirt Blacklist

IT IS HEARTENING to hear th Serge Koussevitzky has refused t fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment o Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

A House of Refuge

COLUMBIA will invade South Field ranting a site for he library

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
MAY 26 1931

It Seems To Me

By Heywood Broun

Atomic Energy and the Whole.

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the State. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

A Black Shirt Blacklist.

IT IS heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

IT SEEMS TO ME

By HEYWOOD BROUN

NEW YORK.

IN HIS ADDRESS in celebration of the anniversary of the Red Cross dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong, he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

IT IS HEARTENING to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

COLUMB

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS
MAY 27 1931

211

IT SEEMS TO ME

Ideas and opinions expressed in this column are those of one of America's most interesting writers and are presented without regard to their agreement or disagreement with the editorial attitude of this paper.—The Editor.

By HEYWOOD BROUN

* * *

Atomic Energy

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the president are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced thru dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Artruro Toscanini beat time.

Mussini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

Black Shirt Blacklist

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

* * *

A House of Refuge

COLUMBIA UNI

YWOOD BR

"It is a question of principle with nt reason."
as well said. And the incident ou boycott upon the part of all who respe e rights of art. American singers, American cts and authors should put the land of the B upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his and knees in apology to the great man whom he rassed and slighted.

N his address
Cross, Pres
the value of private and said that she did support in her work.
"Governments are "frequently too short demands of critical depended on the inst
heart to finance the i bility and freedom of
It may be true tha response to the need of a curious thing that States should point, al ernments have been sighted it would seem about it. There is no gards forever. Even passion, too, for that ll cared for ing, in the y on New book-lined e was quite acters in Turn."

wealthy, is physician

o promised ght.

r of hectic
e, something him. He, no alous of his d rather to men who on her, and with peculiar attention be-dinner table,

THESE individuals
President are not state. A government of individuals. Instea official action, it would to iron them out and

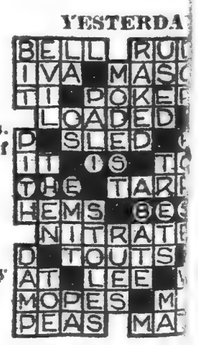
Question

HORIZONTAL
1 Perspiration.
6 Identification papers necessary in foreign ports.
14 City center of a bloodless revolution.
16 To kill with hunger.
17 One.
18 Had sympathy with.
19 To secure.
20 To cut off.
22 To ogle.
23 Senior.
24 Marked with lines.
26 Child.
27 King's stewards.
30 Statement.
31 to corrode.

YESTERDA



40 Heedless.
42 To exist.
43 5,280 feet.
44 To permit.
45 One and one
48 Philippine language.
50 The king an

212

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DENISON, TEXAS
HERALD

MAY 20 1931

The conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was presented a clock by subscribers. Was this a subtle hint to keep better time?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 19 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

It is seldom indeed that a climb to the second balcony (anywhere) is made so entertaining and instructive as the climb which was described in a letter to the Journal recently. Half way up the stairs in Symphony Hall, Boston, the "history" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is set forth in the portraits of its leaders, in letters, accounts, programs, all the visible—and least important—evidences of that great organization's activities.

It has been said that the history of an institution must resolve itself into the record of the work of individuals.

The character of every leader has indeed been reflected in the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra: Gericke exquisite in detail, Paur dynamic, Muck scholarly. And though we still insist that conductors, their outward and visible flourishes, ought to be hidden at concerts (Did not great Dr. Muck lay down his baton in the midst of a Beethoven symphony and let the orchestra carry on without him as a mark of his confidence in them?) yet we are the more convinced from a reading of this history that their presence "behind the scenes" is indispensable.

Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and the rest became an essential part of the music they played. And over their energetic spirits, guiding, advising, making the practical arrangements with carpenters, bill collectors, and aggrieved patrons hovered the genius of Colonel Henry Higginson. Reconciled to his limitations as a performer and composer Colonel Higginson knew what he wanted. It is refreshing to read how he set out to get it: good tuneful music, low prices so that poor people could get the inspiration they needed, short programs so that they wouldn't be bored. He knew that he would have to pay for these splendid ideals, and he did graciously and often.

Henschel struggled manfully for three years and left an organization which Gericke, coming to take his place, said "had some musicians but was no orchestra." He proceeded with indefatigable pains to make it one—to subdue the brasses and "teach the violins to sing." So that people who formerly came—as, alas, they still do in many instances—because it was the thing to do, came under his leadership, because they wanted to hear good music.

There they all are half way up the stairs on the way to the second balcony—including the most pronounced individualist of them all: Koussevitzky, who at an early age "retired into a corner with his monster," the double bass, and emerged having impressed it with his masterful touch, something he has continued to do with everything he has touched since.

It would repay anyone to stop off in that "refreshment" room on his way to a "Pop" concert and brush up a bit on Boston Symphony history during this present fifty year jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAY 30 1931

Announcement comes from Boston that the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra will remain unchanged during the coming season. No member is leaving, and all have been engaged for another year.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

New Stravinsky Concerto

Igor Stravinsky is completing the score of a new violin concerto which will have its first American performance next season under Koussevitzky, with Samuel Dushkin, to whom the concerto is dedicated, playing the solo part. The world premiere of the concerto will take place in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Bruno Walter, and Duskin as soloist. The first American performance will be in Boston on January 1, with a second hearing the following day. Dushkin has been concertizing in Europe for the last three years.

It is now agreed that Stravinsky's new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra shall be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 1 and 2, 1932. As already announced Mr. Samuel Dushkin will be the violinist. The next week, in all probability, it will be heard at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

MAY 30 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

MUSICAL MORTALITY AND THE MACHINE

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

NO ALERT and intelligent musician can be unaware of the fact that the artists and scientists who have achieved such amazing things with disks and gramophones are approaching the solution of most of the problems that stand in the way of reproducing the characteristic qualities of various kinds of musical tone. Those of us who are not willing to be regarded as examples of esthetic bourbonism and inertia are accustomed to the feats of modern recording and reproduction. We take for granted the fact that Toscanini's string tone, the mellow thunders of the Bayreuth orchestra, Stokowski's brass choir, the phrasing and voice and diction of Janssen and Schorr and Kipnis and Leider and Lotte Lehmann, Rachmaninoff's way of striking octaves, Muck's uncanny mastery of the "Luftpause" and the ritardando—we take for granted the fact that these things have been given into our permanent possession with so close an approach to their reality that they are secured to us for our delight so long as our capacity of response to the rare and the excelling is undiminshed.

For let us not forget that what the recording and reproducing mechanisms have done is to give virtual permanence to the transitory. The statement is a truism, yet its implications are insufficiently realized. Some of us are inclined to sneer at what is abusively called "mechanical" music; yet the droll and surprising fact emerges that it is precisely the machine which has conferred a kind of deathlessness upon the mortal body of projected musical sound.

The tone of the Philharmonic strings as Toscanini has evoked it survives only in the aural memory. It may never be evoked again. It is born, and dies upon the instant. But science and the machine have found a way of conquering this death that has slain the living body of all music since time began; and the day is approaching when we shall be able to say of all created musical loveliness, as the seers have long said of another kind of immortality, "In the midst of death we are in life."

An eminent expert in the science of musical sound, who is also a sensitive assessor of esthetic values, a conservative and challenging critic—Professor Charles Weyl, of the University of Pennsylvania—has lately made the striking assertion that "there is every reason to believe that possibly within the next ten or fifteen years recorded reproduction of music will be a practically perfect thing as judged by the most skilled listener." Those of us who are aware of contemporary achievements in this field will do well to ponder that assertion.

We take these things, perhaps, too much for granted. Rather we should shout aloud over them, turn ourselves into animated and articulate signposts, as Clive Bell said that we should always do in the presence of extraordinary manifestations of beauty and of power, crying "Stop! Look! Listen!" Have we not been warned by Chesterton that the curse which came before history has laid on us all "a tendency to be weary of wonders"? And to be weary of wonders is surely among the cardinal sins of the spirit.

* * *

Fairy Tales on Wax

THE achievements of those indefatigable and wonder-working craftsmen who are perpetuating great music for a much too casual world proceed apace. One of the latest to come under our notice is a recording by Victor of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two children, Mimie and Jean Godebski, and afterward scored for orchestra. The recorded performance is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its beautiful reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained.

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis and Chloe," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

The Sleeping Beauty of the opening "Pavanne" is, of course, that famous and fortunate lady who enjoyed a hundred-year sleep in a castle where she was sequestered by an impenetrable wood that sprang up and enclosed her, secure from loud speakers, reminiscent golfers and people who gabble about the arts, until she was disenchanted by the valorous prince who woke and wedded her. The grave and tranquil movement is initiated by a solo flute against a counterpoint of violas pizzicati and muted horn. The princess, probably weakened by her century of sleep, does not dance long: the piece ends at the twentieth measure.

At the head of the second movement (in moderate tempo), "Hop o' My Thumb," Ravel quotes a passage from Perrault's tale:

"He believed that he would have no difficulty in finding his way by means of the bread-crumbs which he had strewn wherever he had passed; but he was greatly surprised when he could not find a single crumb: the birds had come and eaten them all."

After three introductory measures for muted violins alone, an oboe sings the pensive theme, the violins accompanying it in thirds. Violin harmonics, flute and piccolo suggest the twittering birds.

* * *

Enchantments and Adventures

NEXT we are introduced, in a movement in march time that employs the pentatonic scale, to "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes." One understands that when a Frenchman uses the word "pagode," he may mean either (1) a pagoda; (2) an idol—worshiped in a pagoda; or (3) a puppet, "a little grotesque figure with a movable head." And in archaic English, a pagod, as Mr. Webster reminds us, meant both a pagoda and an idol. A "laideron," for the French, is "an ugly girl, woman; ugly creature."

Now, the "pagodes" imagined by the Countess d'Aulnoy (a seventeenth-century imitator of Perrault) in her "Serpentin Vert," whence Ravel derived the inspiration for this movement, were the musical nouveaux-riches of Fairyland: diminutive creatures with bodies made of jewels, crystal, porcelain and other expensive substances, who played upon Lilliputian instruments—viols made of almond-shells, theorbos of nutshells.

In the Countess d'Aulnoy's tale, the Princess Laideronnette was condemned by the curse of a depraved witch to endure the burden of an atrocious ugliness. When Laideronnette became of age, she asked that she might be permitted to seclude herself in a distant castle where she would never be stared at; and this favor was granted her. One day, in the adjacent forest, she encountered a monstrous green serpent. Guarded by this serpent, Laideronnette, greatly daring, and happily forgetful of her looks, made a sea voyage in a frail craft that was wrecked on the shore of a country where dwelt the diminutive Pagodes. Their mysterious and unseen king was really, as you will have guessed, the Green Snake, who, like the unhappy Laideronnette, had been bewitched by the wicked fairy. Of course, they were both, in due time, restored to their true forms, with an entangling alliance in prospect.

In the movement entitled "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," we have a tonal variant of the ancient and improving tale of self-sacrificing Fulchritude and the reward of its virtue. This culmination of the parable is indicated by the following passages quoted in Ravel's score, and credited to Mme. Leprince de Beaumont:

"When I think of your kindness, you seem to me less ugly."
"Oh, lady, I have, it is true, a kind heart; but I am a monster."
"There are many men who are more monstrous than you."
"If I had the wit to do so, I would make you a fine compliment to repay you, but I am only a beast."

* * *

"Beauty, will you marry me?"
"No, Beast."

* * *

"I die content since I have the pleasure of seeing you once more."
"No, my dear Beast, you shall not die; you shall live to be my husband!"
The Beast had vanished and she saw at her feet only a Prince more beautiful than Love, who thanked her for having ended his enchantment.

* * *

THIS movement is a slow waltz. A clarinet impersonates Beauty (beginning at the second measure); the double bassoon (half a hundred measures further on) enacts the Beast. You hear them joined—apparently, both are talking at once. There is a climax, a pause, a harp glissando, and the transformed Beast appears in delicately magical harmonics for a solo violin; after the Prince makes love on his 'cello, while Beauty responds upon a flute in company with a discreetly chaperoning piccolo.

For the Finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew and his title. We can only listen with innocent ears, and remember a line from Poe: "Ah, bear in mind this garden is enchanted!"

The movement begins softly, in slow tempo, triple time, for the strings alone. The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

The difficult task of reproducing these tenuous fantasies without disastrously blurring or coarsening them has been accomplished with a surprising measure of success by the makers of the new records. The success, of course, is not unqualified. There are disappointing moments—as, for example, the tonal harshness of the forte for strings and woodwind in the second movement; the undue subordination of the English horn in the same movement; the ineffectiveness of the brief but important 'cello solo which sings the love song of the disenchanted Prince.

Yet such exacting passages as those in "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" which show us the Beast transformed; the delicately dissonant close of the movement; and the iridescent pages that end the Finale, are admirably conveyed. Here the art of the recorders becomes, like Ravel's Pagodes, jeweled and crystalline and choice.

212

THIS CLIPPING FROM DENISON, TEXAS
HERALD

MAY 2 1931

The conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra was presented a clock by subscribers. Was this a subtle hint to keep better time?

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 31 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

It is seldom indeed that a climb to the second balcony (anywhere) is made so entertaining and instructive as the climb which was described in a letter to the Journal recently. Half way up the stairs in Symphony Hall, Boston, the "history" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is set forth in the portraits of its leaders, in letters, accounts, programs, all the visible—and least important—evidences of that great organization's activities.

It has been said that the history of an institution must resolve itself into the record of the work of individuals.

The character of every leader has indeed been reflected in the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra: Gericke exquisite in detail, Paur dynamic, Muck scholarly. And though we still insist that conductors, their outward and visible flourishes, ought to be hidden at concerts (Did not great Dr. Muck lay down his baton in the midst of a Beethoven symphony and let the orchestra carry on without him as a mark of his confidence in them?) yet we are the more convinced from a reading of this history that their presence "behind the scenes" is indispensable.

Henschel, Gericke Nikisch, Paur, and the rest became an essential part of the music they played. And over their energetic spirits, guiding, advising, making the practical arrangements with carpenters, bill collectors, and aggrieved patrons hovered the genius of Colonel Henry Higginson. Reconciled to his limitations as a performer and composer Colonel Higginson knew what he wanted. It is refreshing to read how he set out to get it: good tuneful music, low prices so that poor people could get the inspiration they needed, short programs so that they wouldn't be bored. He knew that he would have to pay for these splendid ideals, and he did graciously and often.

Henschel struggled manfully for three years and left an organization which Gericke, coming to take his place, said "had some musicians but was no orchestra." He proceeded with indefatigable pains to make it one—to subdue the brasses and "teach the violins to sing." So that people who formerly came—as, alas, they still do in many instances—because it was the thing to do, came under his leadership, because they wanted to hear good music.

There they all are half way up the stairs on the way to the second balcony—including the most pronounced individualist of them all: Koussevitzky, who at an early age "retired into a corner with his monster," the double bass, and emerged having impressed it with his masterful touch, something he has continued to do with everything he has touched since.

It would repay anyone to stop off in that "refreshment" room on his way to a "Pop" concert and brush up a bit on Boston Symphony history during this present fifty year jubilee.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 30 1931

Announcement comes from Boston that the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra will remain unchanged during the coming season. No member is leaving, and all have been engaged for another year.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

New Stravinsky Concerto

Igor Stravinsky is completing the score of a new violin concerto which will have its first American performance next season under Koussevitzy, with Samuel Dushkin, to whom the concerto is dedicated, playing the solo part. The world premiere of the concerto will take place in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Bruno Walter, and Duskin as soloist. The first American performance will be in Boston on January 1, with a second hearing the following day. Dushkin has been concertizing in Europe for the last three years.

It is now agreed that Stravinsky's new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra shall be played for the first times in America at the Symphony Concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 1 and 2, 1932. As already announced Mr. Samuel Dushkin will be the violinist. The next week, in all probability, it will be heard at the concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS

MAY 30 1931

Mussolini Music

MUSSOLINI got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by Gen. Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

MUSICAL MORTALITY AND THE MACHINE

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

NO ALERT and intelligent musician can be unaware of the fact that the artists and scientists who have achieved such amazing things with disks and gramophones are approaching the solution of most of the problems that stand in the way of reproducing the characteristic qualities of various kinds of musical tone. Those of us who are not willing to be regarded as examples of esthetic bourbonism and inertia are accustomed to the feats of modern recording and reproduction. We take for granted the fact that Toscanini's string tone, the mellow thunders of the Bayreuth orchestra, Stokowski's brass choir, the phrasing and voice and diction of Janssen and Schorr and Kipnis and Leider and Lotte Lehmann, Rachmaninoff's way of striking octaves, Muck's uncanny mastery of the "Luftpause" and the ritardando—we take for granted the fact that these things have been given into our permanent possession with so close an approach to their reality that they are secured to us for our delight so long as our capacity of response to the rare and the excelling is undiminshed.

For let us not forget that what the recording and reproducing mechanisms have done is to give virtual permanence to the transitory. The statement is a truism, yet its implications are insufficiently realized. Some of us are inclined to sneer at what is abusively called "mechanical" music; yet the droll and surprising fact emerges that it is precisely the machine which has conferred a kind of deathlessness upon the mortal body of projected musical sound.

The tone of the Philharmonic strings as Toscanini has evoked it survives only in the aural memory. It may never be evoked again. It is born, and dies upon the instant. But science and the machine have found a way of conquering this death that has slain the living body of all music since time began; and the day is approaching when we shall be able to say of all created musical loveliness, as the seers have long said of another kind of immortality, "In the midst of death we are in life."

An eminent expert in the science of musical sound, who is also a sensitive assessor of esthetic values, a conservative and challenging critic—Professor Charles Weyl, of the University of Pennsylvania—has lately made the striking assertion that "there is every reason to believe that possibly within the next ten or fifteen years recorded reproduction of music will be a practically perfect thing as judged by the most skilled listener." Those of us who are aware of contemporary achievements in this field will do well to ponder that assertion.

We take these things, perhaps, too much for granted. Rather we should shout aloud over them, turn ourselves into animated and articulate signposts, as Clive Bell said that we should always do in the presence of extraordinary manifestations of beauty and of power, crying "Stop! Look! Listen!" Have we not been warned by Chesterton that the curse which came before history has laid on us all "a tendency to be weary of wonders"? And to be weary of wonders is surely among the cardinal sins of the spirit.

* * *

Fairy Tales on Wax

THE achievements of those indefatigable and wonder-working craftsmen who are perpetuating great music for a much too casual world proceed apace. One of the latest to come under our notice is a recording by Victor of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two children, Mimie and Jean Godebski, and afterward scored for orchestra. The recorded performance is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its beautiful reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained.

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis and Chloe," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

The Sleeping Beauty of the opening "Pavanne" is, of course, that famous and fortunate lady who enjoyed a hundred-year sleep in a castle where she was sequestered by an impenetrable wood that sprang up and enclosed her, secure from loud speakers, reminiscent golfers and people who gabble about the arts, until she was disenchanted by the valorous prince who woke and wedded her. The grave and tranquil movement is initiated by a solo flute against a counterpoint of violas pizzicati and muted horn. The princess, probably weakened by her century of sleep, does not dance long: the piece ends at the twentieth measure.

At the head of the second movement (in moderate tempo), "Hop o' My Thumb," Ravel quotes a passage from Perrault's tale:

"He believed that he would have no difficulty in finding his way by means of the bread-crumbs which he had strewn wherever he had passed; but he was greatly surprised when he could not find a single crumb: the birds had come and eaten them all."

After three introductory measures for muted violins alone, an oboe sings the pensive theme, the violins accompanying it in thirds. Violin harmonics flute and piccolo suggest the twittering birds.

* * *

Enchantments and Adventures

NEXT we are introduced, in a movement in march time that employs the pentatonic scale, to "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes." One understands that when a Frenchman uses the word "pagode," he may mean either (1) a pagoda; (2) an idol—worshiped in a pagoda; or (3) a puppet, "a little grotesque figure with a movable head." And in archaic English, a pagod, as Mr. Webster reminds us, meant both a pagoda and an idol. A "laideron," for the French, is "an ugly girl, woman; ugly creature."

Now, the "pagodes" imagined by the Countess d'Aulnoy (a seventeenth-century imitator of Perrault) in her "Serpentin Vert," whence Ravel derived the inspiration for this movement, were the musical nouveaux-riches of Fairyland: diminutive creatures with bodies made of jewels, crystal, porcelain and other expensive substances, who played upon Lilliputian instruments—viols made of almond-shells, theorbos of nutshells.

In the Countess d'Aulnoy's tale, the Princess Laideronnette was condemned by the curse of a depraved witch to endure the burden of an atrocious ugliness. When Laideronnette became of age, she asked that she might be permitted to seclude herself in a distant castle where she would never be stared at; and this favor was granted her. One day, in the adjacent forest, she encountered a monstrous green serpent. Guarded by this serpent, Laideronnette, greatly daring, and happily forgetful of her looks, made a sea voyage in a frail craft that was wrecked on the shore of a country where dwelt the diminutive Pagodes. Their mysterious and unseen king was really, as you will have guessed, the Green Snake, who, like the unhappy Laideronnette, had been bewitched by the wicked fairy. Of course, they were both, in due time, restored to their true forms, with an entangling alliance in prospect.

In the movement entitled "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast," we have a tonal variant of the ancient and improving tale of self-sacrificing Fulchritude and the reward of its virtue. This culmination of the parable is indicated by the following passages quoted in Ravel's score, and credited to Mme. Leprince de Beaumont:

"When I think of your kindness, you seem to me less ugly."
"Oh, lady, I have, it is true, a kind heart; but I am a monster."
"There are many men who are more monstrous than you."
"If I had the wit to do so, I would make you a fine compliment to repay you, but I am only a beast."

* * *

"Beauty, will you marry me?"
"No, Beast."

* * *

"I die content since I have the pleasure of seeing you once more."
"No, my dear Beast, you shall not die; you shall live to be my husband!"
The Beast had vanished and she saw at her feet only a Prince more beautiful than Love, who thanked her for having ended his enchantment.

* * *

THIS movement is a slow waltz. A clarinet impersonates Beauty (beginning at the second measure); the double bassoon (half a hundred measures further on) enacts the Beast. You hear them joined—apparently, both are talking at once. There is a climax, a pause, a harp glissando, and the transformed Beast appears in delicately magical harmonics for a solo violin; after the Prince makes love on his 'cello, while Beauty responds upon a in company with a discreetly chaperoning piccolo.

For the Finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew nd his title. We can only listen with innocent ears, and remember a e from Poe: "Ah, bear in mind this garden is enchanted!"

The movement begins softly, in slow tempo, triple time, for the strings alone. The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

The difficult task of reproducing these tenuous fantasies without disastrously blurring or coarsening them has been accomplished with a surprising measure of success by the makers of the new records. The success, of course, is not unqualified. There are disappointing moments—as, for example, the tonal harshness of the forte for strings and woodwind in the second movement; the undue subordination of the English horn in the same movement; the ineffectiveness of the brief but important 'cello solo which sings the love song of the disenchanted Prince.

Yet such exacting passages as those in "Conversations of Beauty and the Beast" which show us the Beast transformed; the delicately dissonant close of the movement; and the iridescent pages that end the Finale, are admirably conveyed. Here the art of the recorders becomes, like Ravel's Pagodes, jeweled and crystalline and choice.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAY 16 1931

The News To-day

By WILLIAM MORRIS

TOSCANINI IS SLAPPED

THE outrageous assault upon Arturo Toscanini by a gang of Fascist ruffians in Bologna is not the first incident of the kind, nor was it the first experience of the kind that this great musician has suffered. Twice before, to our knowledge, and possibly oftener than that, the premier orchestral conductor in the world has been subjected to similar outrage on the part of Fascisti, although this is the first time personal violence has been visited upon him.

The Fascists have as their party song a rollicking tune (to which are sung a few lines of doggerel) called "Giovanezza," or Youth. As their power grew they insisted upon the playing of "Giovanezza" at all public affairs, together with the Garibaldi March, the official national anthem. As the power of the government faded out and the Fascist party, through its Grand Council, tended more and more to assume all powers and functions of government "Giovanezza" tended more and more to overshadow the Garibaldi March, and it is now played on all public occasions and everyone—even the shadow-king and his family—rise and give the Fascist salute when the band brays it forth.

The Fascists have long made it obligatory that upon every occasion where music is played "Giovanezza" must be played first. One man alone has been big and courageous enough to refuse. Arturo Toscanini, greatest conductor in the world—considered by many the greatest conductor the world has ever known—refused point-blank to introduce operas and symphonic concerts with a party rallying song.

DEFIED FASCISTS

Every intelligent and cultured Italian realizes the greatness of Toscanini. In a day when all independence is crushed, when Italy's great writers and thinkers, philosophers and historians, lovers of liberty and idealists are either in exile, in jail or gagged, Toscanini is one of the greatest assets of that country before the world.

One of the sad things about Fascism is the fact that its activities began with gangs of irresponsible boys, youths of 18 and 20 who beat up men and outraged women without let or hindrance. And when those gangs paved the way for the rise to power of the Fascist leaders it was impossible to wave the youths back again to a quiet, peaceful and orderly life.

An American newspaper correspondent who worked long in Italy says in a recent book that young Italy is being raised with revolvers and daggers in their hands and hatred in their hearts. Such gangs of youths, possibly useful to their leaders at one time or another in beating up opponents and wrecking newspaper plants, cannot be expected to have the respect for a great man such as Toscanini deserves. He is a musician, and he will not play "Giovanezza." That is enough for them. He has been subjected to outrage for a number of years.

It is possible that his treatment and the feeling that his beloved Italy seems to be losing its passion for music for its own sake aided materially in his decision in 1929 to accept the leadership of our own Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, and to undertake to conduct the Wagner festival in Bayreuth every summer.

While still at La Scala, the great opera house in Milan, Toscanini successfully defied the Fascists who insisted that every opera be preceded by "Giovanezza." He quite properly maintained that neither a party song nor even a national anthem has any place in an artistic programme. Real love of country can find other ways of expressing itself. Such cheapness degrades music and degrades those who accept it as patriotism.

There came a time when King Victor Emmanuel came to Milan and a concert was given in his honor. He refused to play "Giovanezza" for the King (who probably would not relish the compliment, anyway), and when he heard that a piano had been placed upon the stage for a playing of the song he was furious and demanded—and received—an apology from the city officials.

LAST YEAR

It was shortly after that incident that he resigned his La Scala post to come to New York.

Last year, during the triumphal tour of the Philharmonic in Europe, the same question came up again. The Crown Prince and his bride attended a concert, and if "Giovanezza" and the Garibaldi march had not been played the concert would have been called off. Toscanini kept the musicians from entering the theatre until a local military band had played the two tunes and had left. Then he took his orchestra to the stage and gave his concert.

The incident of yesterday may possibly induce the great Maestro to leave Italy and make his home permanently in New York, returning to Europe only for the Wagner festivals in Bayreuth. It certainly made no friends for Fascism outside of Italy.

The occasion recalls the somewhat parallel (although by no means identical) incident of Dr. Karl Muck and "The Star Spangled Banner." During war time, by common consent the Anthem is played on every occasion, as the audience rises. Opinions may differ as to the artistic merit of the composition as a prelude to "Die Meistersinger" or a Bach fugue, but such is and has been the custom.

Dr. Muck is a German and a very great musician; there are those who insist that as an orchestral conductor he is greater than Toscanini. At the outbreak of the war he had been for some years conductor of the Boston Symphony. When the war began the usual hysterical attacks began upon every German and person suspected of German sympathies.

Dr. Muck instantly became the centre of controversy, and demands were made that he play the Anthem. At first he refused; later on, at a concert here in Brooklyn he played the finale to Victor Herbert's "American Fantasy," "The Star Spangled Banner" with Herbertian flourishes. The audience wildly applauded—which is not proper reception for the Anthem—and Muck promptly gave an encore—another wholly improper procedure.

Shortly afterwards Dr. Muck was interned as an enemy alien in a prison camp and there he organized a mighty fine band out of interned German musicians.

He is back in Germany, conducting in Hamburg, as brilliant as ever. When asked his opinion of musical conditions in America following his expulsion he said, "Well, you still have Sousa." That was his idea of a ponderous sneer.

The cases of Toscanini and Muck, however, are not identical. Italy is not at war. Toscanini is not an alien in Bologna and "Giovanezza" is no more the national anthem than is—let us say—"Tammany" or "The Sidewalks of New York."

The colored man was about to be placed on trial. He had no lawyer and the court very promptly assigned two young attorneys to act as the Negro's counsel. He looked at the two youngsters in very evident disgust.

"Is there anything else you wanted?" asked the judge.

"Yeah, judge," replied the colored man slowly. "If it's all de same to yo, Ah'd like to exchange mah lawyers fo' a couple of good witnesses!"—Exchange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
MAY 31 1931

The personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be unchanged next year. No member of the orchestra is leaving.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
MAY 16 1931

TOSCANINI BEATEN.

The beating administered to Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, when in Bologna he refused to play the fascist anthem gives food for thought. There are two views which should be taken.

First, there is no excuse for the attack. If the action of the conductor was contrary to the law he should have been arrested, and fined or imprisoned. If it was contrary to good taste, the audience might properly have left the hall and refused to patronize concerts thereafter in which Toscanini appeared. But physical punishment is barbaric. It indicates something wrong with the aggressor, not necessarily with the victim.

Second, there is no excuse for Toscanini's attitude. The music of the fascist anthem may be desperately poor. But it represents something. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, Karl Muck, did the same thing regarding "The Star-Bangled Banner;" and he was properly castigated. These selections are not rendered for musical reasons; they are not part of a musical program. They are a recognition of government. The American flag might not, on some patriotic occasion, fit well with the decorations of an assembly hall; but it would be hung. So with national anthems. Our own is a spirited number when played by a band; it is out of place in the repertoire of an orchestra; it is almost unsingable.

But it is our anthem and should be performed irrespective of the musical effect. So with the fascist piece. Toscanini is far too temperamental. He did not get what he deserved for the beating was inexcusable; but he should have met some sort of a rebuff for his discourtesy to his guest country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAY 16 1931

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREAT FALLS, MONT.
TRIBUNE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAY 29 1931

Gabrilowitsch Will Not Visit La Scala

Refuses to Appear as Result of Treatment of Toscanini.

BERLIN, May 29—(AP) Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, canceled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

213
THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST
MAY 29 1931

As It Seems To Me

Atoms and the Whole

These individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced by dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty perscution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgement of a genius?

* * *

Black Shirt Blacklist

It is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitsky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

(Copyright, 1931, for The Post.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
MAY 29 1931

CONDUCTOR BACKS TOSCANINI

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Refuses to Appear in Milan

Berlin, May 29—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted upon Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at Scala several days ago for the same reason.

For the past few seasons Mr. Gabrilowitsch was guest conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, taking the place of Leopold Stokowski during the latter's absence.

AMERICAN RESENTS SLAPPING EPISODE

Seeks to Cancel Appearance in Milan After Toscanini Is Attacked

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against the treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, said the noted conductor "belongs to the world," that art is universal and that a concert is an artistic and not a political event. In defense of Toscanini's attitude, Koussevitsky informed the Scala directors of his position in the controversy in his last communication with them, he said.

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that Koussevitsky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting on breaking his contract. He said that he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in soviet Russia—which I have quit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
MAY 16 1931

The News To-day

By WILLIAM MORRIS

TOSCANINI IS SLAPPED

THE outrageous assault upon Arturo Toscanini by a gang of Fascist ruffians in Bologna is not the first incident of the kind, nor was it the first experience of the kind that this great musician has suffered. Twice before, to our knowledge, and possibly oftener than that, the premier orchestral conductor in the world has been subjected to similar outrage on the part of Fascisti, although this is the first time personal violence has been visited upon him.

The Fascists have as their party song a rollicking tune (to which are sung a few lines of doggerel) called "Giovanezza," or Youth. As their power grew they insisted upon the playing of "Giovanezza" at all public affairs, together with the Garibaldi March, the official national anthem. As the power of the government faded out and the Fascist party, through its Grand Council, tended more and more to assume all powers and functions of government "Giovanezza" tended more and more to overshadow the Garibaldi March, and it is now played on all public occasions and everyone—even the shadow-king and his family—rise and give the Fascist salute when the band brays it forth.

The Fascists have long made it obligatory that upon every occasion where music is played "Giovanezza" must be played first. One man alone has been big and courageous enough to refuse. Arturo Toscanini, greatest conductor in the world—considered by many the greatest conductor the world has ever known—refused point-blank to introduce operas and symphonic concerts with a party rallying song.

DEFIED FASCISTS

Every intelligent and cultured Italian realizes the greatness of Toscanini. In a day when all independence is crushed, when Italy's great writers and thinkers, philosophers and historians, lovers of liberty and idealists are either in exile, in jail or gagged, Toscanini is one of the greatest assets of that country before the world.

One of the sad things about Fascism is the fact that its activities began with gangs of irresponsible boys, youths of 18 and 20 who beat up men and outraged women without let or hindrance. And when those gangs paved the way for the rise to power of the Fascist leaders it was impossible to wave the youths back again to a quiet, peaceful and orderly life.

An American newspaper correspondent who worked long in Italy says in a recent book that young Italy is being raised with revolvers and daggers in their hands and hatred in their hearts. Such gangs of youths, possibly useful to their leaders at one time or another in beating up opponents and wrecking newspaper plants, cannot be expected to have the respect for a great man such as Toscanini deserves. He is a musician, and he will not play "Giovanezza." That is enough for them. He has been subjected to outrage for a number of years.

It is possible that his treatment and the feeling that his beloved Italy seems to be losing its passion for music for its own sake aided materially in his decision in 1929 to accept the leadership of our own Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, and to undertake to conduct the Wagner festival in Bayreuth every summer.

While still at La Scala, the great opera house in Milan, Toscanini successfully defied the Fascists who insisted that every opera be preceded by "Giovanezza." He quite properly maintained that neither a party song nor even a national anthem has any place in an artistic programme. Real love of country can find other ways of expressing itself. Such cheapness degrades music and degrades those who accept it as patriotism.

There came a time when King Victor Emmanuel came to Milan and a concert was given in his honor. He refused to play "Giovanezza" for the King (who probably would not relish the compliment, anyway), and when he heard that a piano had been placed upon the stage for a playing of the song he was furious and demanded—and received—an apology from the city officials.

LAST YEAR

It was shortly after that incident that he resigned his La Scala post to come to New York.

Last year, during the triumphal tour of the Philharmonic in Europe, the same question came up again. The Crown Prince and his bride attended a concert, and if "Giovanezza" and the Garibaldi march had not been played the concert would have been called off. Toscanini kept the musicians from entering the theatre until a local military band had played the two tunes and had left. Then he took his orchestra to the stage and gave his concert.

The incident of yesterday may possibly induce the great Maestro to leave Italy and make his home permanently in New York, returning to Europe only for the Wagner festivals in Bayreuth. It certainly made no friends for Fascism outside of Italy.

The occasion recalls the somewhat parallel (although by no means identical) incident of Dr. Karl Muck and "The Star Spangled Banner." During war time, by common consent the Anthem is played on every occasion, as the audience rises. Opinions may differ as to the artistic merit of the composition as a prelude to "Die Meistersinger" or a Bach fugue, but such is and has been the custom.

Dr. Muck is a German and a very great musician; there are those who insist that as an orchestral conductor he is greater than Toscanini. At the outbreak of the war he had been for some years conductor of the Boston Symphony. When the war began the usual hysterical attacks began upon every German and person suspected of German sympathies.

Dr. Muck instantly became the centre of controversy, and demands were made that he play the Anthem. At first he refused; later on, at a concert here in Brooklyn he played the finale to Victor Herbert's "American Fantasy," "The Star Spangled Banner" with Herbertian flourishes. The audience wildly applauded—which is not proper reception for the Anthem—and Muck promptly gave an encore—another wholly improper procedure.

Shortly afterwards Dr. Muck was interned as an enemy alien in a prison camp and there he organized a mighty fine band out of interned German musicians.

He is back in Germany, conducting in Hamburg, as brilliant as ever. When asked his opinion of musical conditions in America following his expulsion he said, "Well, you still have Sousa." That was his idea of a ponderous sneer.

The cases of Toscanini and Muck, however, are not identical. Italy is not at war, Toscanini is not an alien in Bologna and "Giovanezza" is no more the national anthem than is—let us say—"Tammany" or "The Sidewalks of New York."

The colored man was about to be placed on trial. He had no lawyer and the court very promptly assigned two young attorneys to act as the Negro's counsel. He looked at the two youngsters in very evident disgust.

"Is there anything else you wanted?" asked the judge.

"Yeah, judge," replied the colored man slowly. "If it's all de same to yo, Ah'd like to exchange mah lawyers fo' a couple of good witnesses!"—Exchange.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
MAY 31 1931

The personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be unchanged next year. No member of the orchestra is leaving.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD
MAY 16 1931

TOSCANINI BEATEN.

The beating administered to Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, when in Bologna he refused to play the fascist anthem gives food for thought. There are two views which should be taken.

First, there is no excuse for the attack. If the action of the conductor was contrary to the law he should have been arrested, and fined or imprisoned. If it was contrary to good taste, the audience might properly have left the hall and refused to patronize concerts thereafter in which Toscanini appeared. But physical punishment is barbaric. It indicates something wrong with the aggressor, not necessarily with the victim.

Second, there is no excuse for Toscanini's attitude. The music of the fascist anthem may be desperately poor. But it represents something. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, Karl Muck, did the same thing regarding "The Star-Bangled Banner;" and he was properly castigated. These selections are not rendered for musical reasons; they are not part of a musical program. They are a recognition of government. The American flag might not, on some patriotic occasion, fit well with the decorations of an assembly hall; but it would be hung. So with national anthems. Our own is a spirited number when played by a band; it is out of place in the repertoire of an orchestra; it is almost unsingable.

But it is our anthem and should be performed irrespective of the musical effect. So with the fascist piece. Toscanini is far too temperamental. He did not get what he deserved for the beating was inexcusable; but he should have met some sort of a rebuff for his discourtesy to his guest country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
MAY 16 1931

MUSICAL CHAUVINISM

If Italy were at war, Arturo Toscanini, for all his renown as a conductor, might get himself into serious trouble by his refusal to give the royal Italian anthem and the Fascist hymn a place on the program of his concerts in his native land.

The unfortunate experience of Dr. Karl Muck, who, though consenting to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" whenever he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war, observed publicly that the American national anthem had no place in orchestral performances, shows how seriously an aroused people may regard even the slightest departure from the formalities of musical patriotism. Italians are supposed to have a more sincere devotion to music for music's sake than Americans. But their musical sensibilities would not, in all probability, prevent them from reacting with extreme violence to irregularities in war time of the kind of which Toscanini is said to be guilty.

Since it has happened in peace time, however, Toscanini's action and the face slappings he suffered from Fascist youth in Bologna will probably be an "incident" and nothing more. That is all it ought to be and all that the principals if they are wise will allow it to be. Conflicts between art and chauvinism are capable of producing unfortunate results even in peace time, and this one between one of the greatest musical figures of the day and a group of narrow detractors is the sort of thing which true patriots as well as lovers of music would prefer to have cut short.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAY 29 1931

Gabrilowitsch Will Not Visit La Scala

Refuses to Appear as Result of Treatment of Toscanini.

BERLIN, May 29—(AP) Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear at La Scala in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted on Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, canceled his contract at La Scala several days ago for the same reason.

213
THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST
MAY 29 1931

As It Seems To Me

Atoms and the Whole

These individuals whose sympathy is commended by the President are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced thru dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty perscution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgement of a genius?

* * *

Black Shirt Blacklist

It is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitzky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitsky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls on his hands and knees in apology to the great man whom he has harassed and slighted.

(Copyright, 1931, for The Post.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
MAY 29 1931

CONDUCTOR BACKS TOSCANINI

Ossip Gabrilowitsch Refuses to Appear in Milan

Berlin, May 29—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, declines to appear in Milan because of Fascist treatment of his contemporary, Arturo Toscanini.

"The insult inflicted upon Toscanini is the most outrageous imaginable," he said in reference to the attack made on the conductor of the New York Philharmonic at Bologna, Italy, several weeks ago when he refused to play the Fascist hymn.

"A handful of ruffians simply appointed themselves as Toscanini's judges and executioners and abused a man whom the entire world venerates. It is beside the question whether he was right or wrong.

"America and Europe have a right to expect Toscanini's assailants to be punished and apologies made to the artist who, perhaps, has done more for Italy's glory than any man living."

Sergius Koussevisky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, cancelled his contract at Scala several days ago for the same reason.

For the past few seasons Mr. Gabrilowitsch was guest conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, taking the place of Leopold Stokowski during the latter's absence.

Milan After Toscanini Is Attacked

PARIS, May 25.—(U.P.)—Only an "amiable settlement" of the recent controversy between Arturo Toscanini and youthful fascists of Bologna will persuade Serge Koussevitsky to cease his efforts to break a contract with the Scala theater in Milan, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today.

Toscanini was slapped and punched by fascists at Bologna when he refused to play the national anthem and the fascist hymn at the opening of a concert. He is conductor of the New York Philharmonic symphony orchestra.

Koussevitsky, who protested against treatment of Toscanini by attempting to end his contract at Milan, d the noted conductor "belongs the world," that art is universal d that a concert is an artistic and t a political event. In defense of scanini's attitude, Koussevitsky inrmed the Scala directors of his poion in the controversy in his last mmunication with them, he said.

Furthermore, he told them that his engagement must be postponed. He had been scheduled to appear in Milan at a festival June 7 to June 17, to conduct two concerts which were to be one of the outstanding musical events of the season in Italy.

The Milan officials replied that Koussevitsky's proposals were impossible, since the concerts already had been announced, but the conductor sent another message insisting on breaking his contract. He said that he preferred to make his appearance in Milan at a more auspicious time.

"I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini episode recalls certain phenomena in soviet Russia—which I have quit."

214

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAY 30 1931

Toscanini Incident Not Closed.

ITALY has made some amends to Arturo Toscanini for the attack made upon him at Bologna about two weeks ago when he refused to open a program with the Fascist anthem, but these have not had the effect of appeasing his fellow-musicians. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, has joined Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony, in refusing to conduct concerts in Italy on account of the treatment accorded to Toscanini, who, said one of them, "belongs to the world, not to one country." In tendering his passports to "il maestro" the Italy of Mussolini has only given Toscanini leave to quit the country when he wishes; it has not rehabilitated itself in the eyes of musicians.

Seldom has the universal character of art been better exemplified than in this incident. Musicians everywhere have been concerned. As was evident from the start, artistic reasons only were behind the refusal of Toscanini to change his program upon demand. Nationalist sentiment in Italy runs too strongly to recognize this and the assault followed.

Now the services of outstanding conductors are to be lost and it may be that the tie between Toscanini and the land of his birth may be loosened. In music-loving Italy these are serious considerations, even if the attitude of the leaders should last no longer than a single season. From all angles, Italy comes off a poor second in the skirmish with the first musician under her flag.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

MAY 31 1931

THIS business of playing national anthems when esthetic aspects are involved on concert occasions is a constantly controversial question. While Toscanini nurses his injuries at his home in Milan after the attack upon him in Bologna, while Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in sympathetic indignation cancels his contract to conduct at the forthcoming festival in Milan on the ground that "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," and while Premier Mussolini is reported to have termed the famous affair a "banal incident," to which, he declares, "we shall not give excessive importance," those whose artistic sensibilities have been jarred may find interest in comparing or contrasting it with another episode that took place in Italy nearly fifty years ago.

The incident was reported at the time by the Roman correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," when the Neumann Company, touring Italy in a repertoire of the Wagnerian works, was scheduled to present "Die Walkuere." "The King," we read, "had promised to attend, and it is customary in Italian theatres, when his Majesty enters, to interrupt the performance by playing the 'Marcia Reale.' Anton Seidl was Neumann's conductor, and he was given to understand what he must do at the moment of the King's appearance in his box. But Mr. Seidl absolutely refused to insult the majesty of King Wagner, his sovereign, by any such inartistic proceeding, and Herr Neumann, after trying in vain to make him obedient to Italian custom, was obliged to call upon the assistant conductor to preside over the opera. The performance began, and the King put in an appearance just as Siegmund and Sieglinde were in the midst of their love duo, whereupon everyone stopped, the 'royal march' was played, and then the duo was resumed!"

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

MAY 31 1931

DIRECTOR DEFENDS BROKEN CONTRACT

Koussevitzki Cites Toscanini Episode in Letter Canceling Italian Concerts

New York Times-Minneapolis Journal Cable

Paris, May 30.—Serge Koussevitzki, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the attack on Maestro Arturo Toscanini and that the latter's passport had been taken away from him by the Italian authorities, has given for publication a letter which he wrote to the directors of LaScala informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract.

"I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country," said the letter. "I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"I resent so keenly the injustice of such an act that I have decided to abandon my engagement, or at least postpone it until such time as your country shall have

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

JUN 1 1931

MUSSOLINI'S MUSIC

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Butler of the marines, writes the New York World-Telegram. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York City and on tour Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by with- Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.—New York World Telegram.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JUN 1 - 1931

The News To-Day

By WILLIAM MORRIS

TROUBLE IN ITALY

THAT there is real trouble in Italy can no longer be doubted, but its exact nature and magnitude cannot as yet be estimated. It may be that the Mussolini order closing the clubs of the Catholic Action may be the beginning of open warfare between the Fascist state and the church, and it may be the beginning of a genuine opposition to the Mussolini dictatorship.

The clubs of the Catholic Action, organizations of laymen, number some 500,000 members. The Mussolini order forcibly closing them is based on the charge that they are meddling in politics, and that such action is intolerable. But it remains to be seen whether the activities of the clubs are intolerable because they are allied with the church, or because they are participating in politics.

On the same day the Dictator ordered the closing of the clubs news comes that five men were sentenced to prison for what is called in the dispatches an anti-Fascist plot. Giordani Viezzoli, twenty-one-year-old aviator, was sent to prison for six years for planning to scatter anti-Fascist literature over Rome from an airplane. No violence was alleged, the prosecutor declaring that the accused men should be sentenced, "to give a salutary example so that none may believe it possible to attack the Fascist state with impunity."

NO OPPOSITION

Only a day earlier an American citizen of Italian birth was tied to a chair and killed by being shot in the back for an alleged conspiracy against Mussolini, and to-day, seventeen days after the assault upon him in Bologna, Arturo Toscanini is still a virtual prisoner in his Milan home for the crime of refusing to mix politics with music, as Dr. Serge Koussevitsky puts it. All this we learn despite the rigid censorship. What is really going on we can only guess. It can be assumed that when some news like to-day's gets out, the situation is grave—even alarming.

In other words, it is clear to-day even to those who have thus far persistently refused to recognize the fact that in Italy no opposition of any kind is permitted. Mussolini acts in accordance with the theory so pungently expressed by M. Tomsky, former Bolshevik leader, that in his country there is room for any number of political parties, providing that one is in power and the rest of them are in jail.

Whether we like Fascism or not, whether a one-party country with all opposition crushed is a good thing or a bad thing, is not what concerns us here. What is important is that the world must recognize that there is such a situation, that open opposition to the party in power (such as is a matter of course in any democratic country) is ruthlessly crushed and opponents punished by jail, exile and even execution.

It may be (and this is our opinion) that the Catholic Action was dissolved because the Dictator felt they were taking an interest in politics, and that as an anti-Fascist, or even a non-Fascist, body of opinion such activity must be crushed. For if allowed to go on it might serve as a nucleus and thus re-establish the system of free discussion and openly permitted differences of opinion that Mussolini and his followers consider so evil a thing.

Labor unions, liberals and democrats, Socialists and other believers in political democracy have been crushed, their leaders assassinated or exiled, their presses destroyed, their families persecuted. Mussolini has been able to stand before the world, backed by the censored information he has allowed to get out of Italy, as the leader of a great state whose people are unitedly behind him—except for the "trifling" opposition of what he calls trash and riff-raff and waves aside in so lordly a manner.

STATE AND CHURCH

But if he comes into collision with the church he will find an opposition that cannot be terrorized merely by the murder of an occasional Matteotti or by administering castor oil and smashing printing presses. Labor and Socialist leaders might be beaten and murdered and their followers scattered, and by the aid of press censorship such activities might even win the somewhat qualified approval of world public opinion.

But in this new collision the leaders the Fascists will have to deal with are priests and cardinals, and their meeting places are the churches of Italy. Castor oil, beatings, arson and even murder, such as the youthful Arditi inflicted upon their opponents from 1922 to 1925, will create trouble far graver than did the murder of Matteotti.

There is an element in European politics that is wholly lacking in America. In our country we are proud of the fact that there is absolute separation of state and church. A Bishop Cannon or a Rabbi Wise may enter political life, as may any priest or clergyman of any faith, but they do so in their private character of citizens of the United States.

In Europe, however, the concept of separation of church and state is relatively new. For a long time the Austrian emperor had the power to veto the election of any pope; the Spanish king was His Most Catholic Majesty and under the law only Catholic churches were allowed in that country; Protestants were permitted to worship only in meeting rooms having no marks to indicate their character as churches. In all countries there were or are to-day clerical parties. Even in Holland the leading party in both chambers of the States-General is the Catholic party, while in Austria, Belgium, Germany, France and other countries there are important clerical parties.

The idea of separation of church and state is so new that even the decree of the new Spanish government, giving all religions equal rights, was as bitterly protested as was the English law in the past century giving Catholics the same political rights as Anglicans.

Italy's politico-religious history is a long and intricate one, and it is hardly to be wondered that Catholic organizations are taking an interest in politics. For a long time the Fascist government refrained from interfering with religiour affairs, Mussolini himself turning his back on his former advanced atheism to order religious instruction in the schools. He undoubtedly feels strong enough now to throw off the mask of supposed friendship to the church.

When we are able to get the true story of what is happening, uncolored by censorship, we will know what is in the wind. But even from the fragmentary information we have it appears that the country is far from unanimous in its support of Fascism.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OKLA. CITY, OKLA.
NEWS

MAY 30 1931

It Seems to Me

By Heywood Broun

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the president are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitsky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

JUN 2 - 1931

Completes Concerto

Igor Stravinsky is completing the score of a new violin concerto which great will have its first American performance next season under Koussevitzky, with Samuel Dushkin, to whom the concerto is dedicated, playing the solo part. The world premiere of the concerto will take place in Berlin with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Bruno Walter, and Duskin as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

BOSTON CONDUCTOR CANCELS CONCERT IN MILAN; RIPS ITALY

[Copyright: 1931: By the New York Times.]

PARIS, May 30.—Serge Koussevitzki, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the attack on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, and that the latter's passport had been taken away from him, has revealed for publication a letter he wrote to the directors of La Scala informing th of his decision not to fulfill his c

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
NEW BEDFORD, MA
MERCURY

JUN 1 1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, declared in Paris that he had "closed the doors of Italy" on himself by his recent letter refusing to conduct at the Scala Opera House in Milan because of the Fascist treatment of Arturo Toscanini.

"I am sorry, because I love the country," Mr. Koussevitzky said, "but I have suffered too much from the Bolsheviks to tolerate what the Fascists are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

Friends of Toscanini here say that his passport has not yet been returned to him.

Mr. Koussevitzky made public the text of his letter to the directors of the Scala Opera House. It reads:

"Gentlemen—I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"Maestro Toscanini does not belong only to Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and prosecution, because of his refusal to mix politics with art.

he injustice of ave decided to nt, or at least n time as your faced the out-who is one of your country-

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT MEYERS, FLA.
PRESS

JUN 1 1931

of ell-lan
'a-ole x-id

MUSSOLINI MUSIC

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the State Department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York City and on tour Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.—New York World Telegram.

214

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH, PA.
GAZETTE

MAY 30 1931

Toscanini Incident Not Closed.

ITALY has made some amends to Arturo Toscanini for the attack made upon him at Bologna about two weeks ago when he refused to open a program with the Fascist anthem, but these have not had the effect of appeasing his fellow-musicians. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, has joined Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony, in refusing to conduct concerts in Italy on account of the treatment accorded to Toscanini, who, said one of them, "belongs to the world, not to one country." In tendering his passports to "il maestro" the Italy of Mussolini has only given Toscanini leave to quit the country when he wishes; it has not rehabilitated itself in the eyes of musicians.

Seldom has the universal character of art been better exemplified than in this incident. Musicians everywhere have been concerned. As was evident from the start, artistic reasons only were behind the refusal of Toscanini to change his program upon demand. Nationalist sentiment in Italy runs too strongly to recognize this and the assault followed.

Now the services of outstanding conductors are to be lost and it may be that the tie between Toscanini and the land of his birth may be loosened. In music-loving Italy these are serious considerations, even if the attitude of the leaders should last no longer than a single season. From all angles, Italy comes off a poor second in the skirmish with the first musician under her flag.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
ENQUIRER

MAY 31 1931

THIS business of playing national anthems when esthetic aspects are involved on concert occasions is a constantly controversial question. While Toscanini nurses his injuries at his home in Milan after the attack upon him in Bologna, while Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in sympathetic indignation cancels his contract to conduct at the forthcoming festival in Milan on the ground that "the Toscanini incident is a disgrace to the Italian Government," and while Premier Mussolini is reported to have termed the famous affair a "banal incident," to which, he declares, "we shall not give excessive importance," those whose artistic sensibilities have been jarred may find interest in comparing or contrasting it with another episode that took place in Italy nearly fifty years ago.

The incident was reported at the time by the Roman correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," when the Neumann Company, touring Italy in a repertoire of the Wagnerian works, was scheduled to present "Die Walkuere." "The King," we read, "had promised to attend, and it is customary in Italian theatres, when his Majesty enters, to interrupt the performance by playing the 'Marcia Reale.' Anton Seidl was Neumann's conductor, and he was given to understand what he must do at the moment of the King's appearance in his box. But Mr. Seidl absolutely refused to insult the majesty of King Wagner, his sovereign, by any such inartistic proceeding, and Herr Neumann, after trying in vain to make him obedient to Italian custom, was obliged to call upon the assistant conductor to preside over the opera. The performance began, and the King put in an appearance just as Siegmund and Sieglinde were in the midst of their love duo, whereupon everyone stopped, the 'royal march' was played, and then the duo was resumed!"

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

MAY 31 1931

DIRECTOR DEFENDS BROKEN CONTRACT

Koussevitzki Cites Toscanini Episode in Letter Canceling Italian Concerts

New York Times-Minneapolis Journal Cable

Paris, May 30.—Serg. Koussevitzki, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the attack on Maestro Arturo Toscanini and that the latter's passport had been taken away from him by the Italian authorities, has given for publication a letter which he wrote to the directors of LaScala informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract.

"I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country," said the letter. "I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"I resent so keenly the injustice of such an act that I have decided to abandon my engagement, or at least postpone it until such time as your country shall have effaced the outrage against a man who is one of the most talented of your countrymen."

Friends of Toscanini here say his passport has not yet been returned to him.—Copyright 1931.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

JUN 1 - 1931

The News To-Day

By WILLIAM MORRIS

TROUBLE IN ITALY

THAT there is real trouble in Italy can no longer be doubted, but its exact nature and magnitude cannot as yet be estimated. It may be that the Mussolini order closing the clubs of the Catholic Action may be the beginning of open warfare between the Fascist state and the church, and it may be the beginning of a genuine opposition to the Mussolini dictatorship.

The clubs of the Catholic Action, organizations of laymen, number some 500,000 members. The Mussolini order forcibly closing them is based on the charge that they are meddling in politics, and that such action is intolerable. But it remains to be seen whether the activities of the clubs are intolerable because they are allied with the church, or because they are participating in politics.

On the same day the Dictator ordered the closing of the clubs news comes that five men were sentenced to prison for what is called in the dispatches an anti-Fascist plot. Giordani Viezzoli, twenty-one-year-old aviator, was sent to prison for six years for planning to scatter anti-Fascist literature over Rome from an airplane. No violence was alleged, the prosecutor declaring that the accused men should be sentenced, "to give a salutary example so that none may believe it possible to attack the Fascist state with impunity."

NO OPPOSITION

Only a day earlier an American citizen of Italian birth was tied to a chair and killed by being shot in the back for an alleged conspiracy against Mussolini, and to-day, seventeen days after the assault upon him in Bologna, Arturo Toscanini is still a virtual prisoner in his Milan home for the crime of refusing to mix politics with music, as Dr. Serge Koussevitsky puts it. All this we learn despite the rigid censorship. What is really going on we can only guess. It can be assumed that when some news like to-day's gets out, the situation is grave—even alarming.

In other words, it is clear to-day even to those who have thus far persistently refused to recognize the fact that in Italy no opposition of any kind is permitted. Mussolini acts in accordance with the theory so pungently expressed by M. Tomsky, former Bolshevik leader, that in his country there is room for any number of political parties, providing that one is in power and the rest of them are in jail.

Whether we like Fascism or not, whether a one-party country with all opposition crushed is a good thing or a bad thing, is not what concerns us here. What is important is that the world must recognize that there is such a situation, that open opposition to the party in power (such as is a matter of course in any democratic country) is ruthlessly crushed and opponents punished by jail, exile and even execution.

It may be (and this is our opinion) that the Catholic Action was dissolved because the Dictator felt they were taking an interest in politics, and that as an anti-Fascist, or even a non-Fascist, body of opinion such activity must be crushed. For if allowed to go on it might serve as a nucleus and thus re-establish the system of free discussion and openly permitted differences of opinion that Mussolini and his followers consider so evil a thing.

Labor unions, liberals and democrats, Socialists and other believers in political democracy have been crushed, their leaders assassinated or exiled, their presses destroyed, their families persecuted. Mussolini has been able to stand before the world, backed by the censored information he has allowed to get out of Italy, as the leader of a great state whose people are unitedly behind him—except for the "trifling" opposition of what he calls trash and riff-raff and waves aside in so lordly a manner.

STATE AND CHURCH

But if he comes into collision with the church he will find an opposition that cannot be terrorized merely by the murder of an occasional Matteotti or by administering castor oil and smashing printing presses. Labor and Socialist leaders might be beaten and murdered and their followers scattered, and by the aid of press censorship such activities might even win the somewhat qualified approval of world public opinion.

But in this new collision the leaders the Fascists will have to deal with are priests and cardinals, and their meeting places are the churches of Italy. Castor oil, beatings, arson and even murder, such as the youthful Arditi inflicted upon their opponents from 1922 to 1925, will create trouble far graver than did the murder of Matteotti.

There is an element in European politics that is wholly lacking in America. In our country we are proud of the fact that there is absolute separation of state and church. A Bishop Cannon or a Rabbi Wise may enter political life, as may any priest or clergyman of any faith, but they do so in their private character of citizens of the United States.

In Europe, however, the concept of separation of church and state is relatively new. For a long time the Austrian emperor had the power to veto the election of any pope; the Spanish king was His Most Catholic Majesty and under the law only Catholic churches were allowed in that country; Protestants were permitted to worship only in meeting rooms having no marks to indicate their character as churches. In all countries there were or are to-day clerical parties. Even in Holland the leading party in both chambers of the States-General is the Catholic party, while in Austria, Belgium, Germany, France and other countries there are important clerical parties.

The idea of separation of church and state is so new that even the decree of the new Spanish government, giving all religions equal rights, was as bitterly protested as was the English law in the past century giving Catholics the same political rights as Anglicans.

Italy's politico-religious history is a long and intricate one, and it is hardly to be wondered that Catholic organizations are taking an interest in politics. For a long time the Fascist government refrained from interfering with religiour affairs, Mussolini himself turning his back on his former advanced atheism to order religious instruction in the schools. He undoubtedly feels strong enough now to throw off the mask of supposed friendship to the church.

When we are able to get the true story of what is happening, uncolored by censorship, we will know what is in the wind. But even from the fragmentary information we have it appears that the country is far from unanimous in its support of Fascism.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
OKLA. CITY, OKLA.
NEWS

MAY 30 1931

It Seems to Me

By Heywood Broun

THESE individuals whose sympathy is commended by the president are not things apart from the structure of the state. A government is, after all, merely an agglomeration of individuals. Instead of boasting of the deficiencies in official action, it would seem much more to the point to try to iron them out and speed up action. It is not too much to look forward to a day when a government can have a heart.

But that sort of efficiency which is supposedly produced through dictatorship has been shown up in striking fashion in Italy. George Bernard Shaw and one or two other former radicals have been seduced by the Mussolini heresy.

The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist regime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini.

* * *

IT is heartening to hear that Serge Koussevitsky has refused to fill a concert engagement at Milan as a protest against the treatment of Toscanini.

The manager of the Scala cabled that time was short and that he did not think the incident sufficient ground for a breach of the contract. Whereupon Mr. Koussevitzky replied, "It is a question of principle with me, and that is sufficient reason."

It was well said. And the incident ought to be sufficient for a boycott upon the part of all who respect the dignity and the rights of art. American singers, American painters, architects and authors should put the land of the Black Shirts upon their blacklist until Mussolini crawls

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 31 1931

BOSTON CONDUCTOR CANCELS CONCERT IN MILAN; RIPS ITALY

[Copyright: 1931: By the New York Times.]

PARIS, May 30.—Serge Koussevitzki, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the attack on Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, and that the latter's passport had been taken away from him, has revealed for publication a letter he wrote to the directors of La Scala informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract:

"Gentlemen: I have learned of the unprecedented outrage perpetrated against an artist in your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement. Maestro Toscanini does not belong only to Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of our colleagues who are exposed to blows and prosecution because of their refusal to mix politics with art."

Mr. Koussevitzki today added: "My letter has closed the doors of Italy to me and I am sorry, for I love the country. But I have suffered too much from bolsheviks to tolerate what the Fascists are doing to artists. Both of these régimes have wrought terrible crimes against the culture and respect which is owing to them and to art."

As a con... City and on tour Signor ... ini has won the admiration and loyalty of music lovers. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna he was knocked down by a Fascist official. Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has now sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

DINNER PLANN...

John H. Hutchinson, of Bord... town, Heads Committee In Charge

Cor...

Igor ... score o...

...forward," from ... d
...h
...p
...:

The services opened ... ing of "America" by ... gathering. Invocation ... nounced by the Rev. ... lowed by Scripture ... Dr. P. H. Jones. The au... "Come Through, Alml... followed by the bacca... dress.

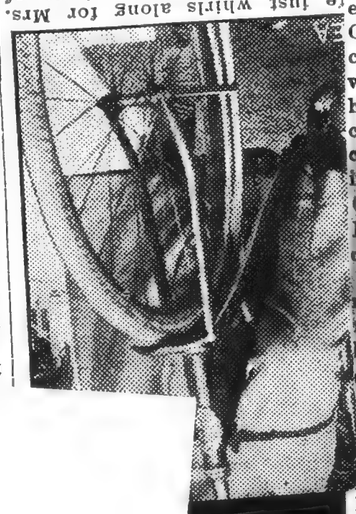
The Rev. Powell ... nounced benediction. ... Those on the pla... Prof. W. C. Chinn, wh... Jay C. Hurd, chairman ... county school board ... Powell, Dr. Jones, chair... Alva board of school ... E. MacCanon, who le... ing.

Class night will ... Wednesday evening a... torium and Graduati...

...tary and was ruined for the ... Robins by outfielder Randy Moore ... who drove in all three of Boston's ... runs with two home runs. Moore's ... second home run came with two out ... in the ninth inning and with two ... strikes on him.

Hard luck featured the ... twen Hollis Thurston and Tom ... The second game was a duel be... than a 10-inning 3 to 3 tie in the ... second contest.

...e just whirls along for Mrs. ... nie S. Howarth, 81, above, of ... ntebello, Calif., who has rid... n her bicycle every day for ... re than 40 years, despite in... easing traffic hazard. Mrs. Ho... rth is known as the "Mother ... Montebello" because she and ... family were the first settlers



THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
JUN 2 - 1931

Appropriately Answered.

Fascist hysteria as directed recently at Bologna against Arturo Toscanini has been answered by his colleagues in such a way as to appeal not only to the musically sophisticated, but to everybody who appreciates an exhibition of good sportsmanship.

The famous musician, it will be recalled, declined to include the official Fascist song, "Giovinezza", in a concert program, on the ground that it is unworthy of a place with really great music. For this certain loyal Fascists punished him with bodily violence, an action which, so far as advices go, is still unrebuked by Mussolini.

However, no dictatorial discipline could match in effectiveness the form of reprisal taken by two of Toscanini's most distinguished colleagues: Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Serge Koussevitsky, conductors, respectively, of the Detroit and Boston Symphony orchestras. Both were to have been guest-directors in Italy this Summer, and both have cancelled these engagements as a protest against the affront to Toscanini. The Gabrilowitsch comment on his own action sums the matter up intelligently. Whether or not "Giovinezza" is proper program material is, he says, beside the point. The important thing is that the man generally conceded to be the world's greatest living conductor has been coarsely insulted, and no reparation made by those officially responsible. Koussevitsky emphasizes the same phase of the matter.

Such men as these two are in a peculiarly powerful position from which to exercise influence. Their pre-eminence is more acutely a matter of individual genius than of technical attainment, a fact which makes them irreplaceable in any ordinary sense. The wielding of this influence in the interest of loyalty and idealism is going to elicit applause from a public immeasurably greater than ever crowded the concert halls of Boston and Detroit.

There never, say musicians, has been another Toscanini, and it is quite possible that there never will be another; probably the whole educated world considers him the chief glory of modern Italy. It would seem, then, that even Il Duce, megalomaniac that he is, might see the wisdom of relegating to such a man the last, supreme word in all matters of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE
JUN 3 - 1931

National Rowdyism Rebuked

The refusal of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a series of concerts in Milan has been followed by similar action on the part of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch explains that his feelings have been outraged by the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, who was manhandled and insulted because he refused to play the Fascist Hymn, which he believed to be without artistic merit.

Koussevitsky has cancelled his concert at the Scala Opera House in Milan because of the "unprecedented outrage" to Toscanini and in doing so has declared that "artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and prosecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Unless Premier Mussolini finds it possible to exercise a more effective restraint over his ardent rowdies, the government of which he is the head is destined to forfeit whatever prestige it may have attained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JUN 3 - 1931

TOSCANINI AND MUCK.

Chicago, May 28.—I have read about the treatment of Toscanini by the Fascists of Bologna. I presume you don't remember about Dr. Karl Muck in 1917 and what as director of the Boston orchestra he got for saying the "Star Spangled Banner" was not music fit for the orchestra to play.

KARL SEPELL.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram
JUN 3 - 1931

Toscanini, the Fascist Anthem and Mussolini

The letter forum is for an exchange of opinion among World-Telegram readers. You are invited to write on any subject of current interest. Brief letters are best. Try to keep within 300 words. No letter of controversial nature will be published unless a bona fide name and address is given. Your name will be withheld if you so request.

By Justin Manin.

FASCISM under Mussolini has persisted in power by tyrannical methods.

The "inalienable rights of man," such as liberty of speech and press, are denied the populace. Censorship and military rule prevail. Taxes are levied with no regard for economics. Intellectuals cannot long endure such oppressive tactics. The rebellious professors, world-renowned historians and former Premiers are exiled. Hence the recent uncalled for and outrageous assault on Arturo Toscanini by the Fascists came as no surprise to the majority of liberal-minded Italians.

Toscanini has been looked upon as a genius. For this reason I am amazed at the little space allowed this incident. Geniuses are benefactors of mankind. No nation retains a special hold on supermen. Only a world-wide protest against this performance involving Toscanini could awaken Fascism to its mistakes. Mankind must acquire the habit of defending animate genius.

The vast majority of the Italian people deeply regretted this attack. Italians, having always been devoted to music and liberty, could not approve such conduct.

The spirit of Mazzini and Garibaldi still lives in the hearts of their countrymen. Liberal-minded Italians are anxiously awaiting the day when they can vindicate their honor.

Pelham, N. Y.

By E. E G.

Your editorial of May 27 about Mr. Toscanini in Italy is evidently the result of misinformation.

Mr. Toscanini has not been and is not being held a prisoner in any manner whatever in Italy. An official communication from Rome stated so last week, saying also that with the passport in his possession he is free to go wherever he pleases. Mr. Toscanini himself has telegraphed in the same sense to some of his friends here.

Mr. Toscanini never fails to play the English anthem when in England, and if he likes to try spite work in Italy he has to stand the consequences. The great maestro has a temper of his own that often gets the better of him and he then fails to use common sense. Under the circumstances of Toscanini's case in Bologna how would an American audience meet an arrogant refusal by anybody to play "The Star Spangled Banner"?

New York.

By Jean Riegger.

I wish to express my appreciation of your editorial of May 27 "Mussolini Music" and of Mr. Heywood Broun's column of the previous Monday.

It is only to be regretted that friend Benito is unable to read such excellent comments and be apprised of what rational thinking sible Fascists treated Toscanini more than the Duce and all sane-minded Fascists and their sympathizers.

Are you sure that the act was committed by a Fascist official and that said officer has not been punished? The United Press cables from Italy have not mentioned any officer's name, but referred simply to Fascists.

The proper manner to deal with Toscanini the man—not the genius glory of Italy—was pointed out to us in 1917 at the time the German director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to play the Star Spangled Banner."

Already once before Toscanini refused to play Italy's national hymn in La Scala Theatre, Milan, which cost him its much cherished leadership.

New York.

By Rulodph Pucelli.

Your editorial, "Mussolini Music," may impress all liberty-lovers, but not those who are unbiased law—I mean the law of supply

68 TO BE GRADUATED AT MILITARY SCHOOL

New York Academy at Cornwall Will Hold Commencement Exercises This Week.

Special to The World-Telegram.

CORNWALL-ON-HUDSON, N. Y., June 3.—The forty-second annual commencement exercises of New York Military Academy will be held here this week, beginning with the final guard mount at 5 P. M. tomorrow and ending with the last parade at 1:30 P. M. Saturday. The program includes military exhibitions, Troop "D" horse show, dress parade and graduation hop on Friday, and the award of commissions and warrants.

The graduation class, which will be addressed by Dr. H. Percy Silver, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, New York City, comprises sixty-eight students, many of whom are from Greater New York. Others are from as far south as Birmingham, Ala., while one is from Ancon, Canal Zone.

URGES KNICKERS IN CHURCH.

Special to The World-Telegram.

WHITE PLAINS, June 3.—An 8 A. M. service for sportsmen at which sports garb will be the accepted thing, will be inaugurated Sunday, by the Rev. Arthur Stanley at the Congregational Church in the high- [illegible] American anthem?

Let us examine the kind of government we have to brag about and to show to the world. This nation of the free, and the based on the rights of the people. I learn that almost every of the Constitution fully violated not only but by high powers

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

Mussolini Music

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the state department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official.

Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILKES BARRE, PA.
NEWS
JUN 4 - 1931

215

Toscanini, the Fascist Anthem and Mussolini

to curtail the liberty of Arturo Toscanini because he declined to conduct the Fascist hymn at Bologna, thereby inviting a physical assault from partisans who were more zealous than sensible. Signor Toscanini is one of the outstanding Italians of the day. Except for Il Duce himself, he is probably the best known member of the race internationally, and the most highly regarded as a man of genius. Unquestionably he is the foremost conductor of opera and orchestra extant. His art transcends all racial culture and temperament, and is universal.

To treat such a man as a culprit and place him in duress because he had his own ideas about whether he cared to conduct a certain piece of music would be an absurdity the world would never forget or cease to consider with contempt. It would be a grotesquerie beyond wholly adequate definition. And so Signor Mussolini seems to have viewed the matter.

Whether Il Duce was aided in reaching his decision by protests which were commencing to reach his ears, it is not possible to say. But it is certain that the treatment Signor Toscanini received in Bologna and afterward has had unofficial international reverbations. It is circumstantially reported, for example, that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, abruptly cancelled his engagement to conduct the June festival at La Scala opera house in Milan and did so as a protest against the treatment received by his fellow artist. It is understood, too, that Koussevitzky is showing himself deaf to all representations about the obligations of contract, "pending further developments." Such an attitude conveying in implication that Toscanini was the victim of an outbreak of barbarianism, is the sort of implication to which the artistic Italian people would be most sensitive, and which would hurt them most.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELGRAM
JUN 5 193[illegible]

(Special Cable to The Herald)
PARIS, May 31—Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's passport, made public today a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala theatre, informing them of his decision not to fulfil his contract. The letter reads:

"Gentlemen: I have learned from newspapers [illegible] unprecedented [illegible] been perpetrated your country. [illegible] deeply hurt that [illegible] you to libera[illegible] ment which I ac[illegible] of June. [illegible] does not be-

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, INDIANA
SUN
JUN [illegible] 1931

Mussolini Music

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Butler of the marines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the state department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censer American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official.

Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JUN 2 - 1931

Appropriately Answered.

Fascist hysteria as directed recently at Bologna against Arturo Toscanini has been answered by his colleagues in such a way as to appeal not only to the musically sophisticated, but to everybody who appreciates an exhibition of good sportsmanship.

The famous musician, it will be recalled, declined to include the official Fascist song, "Giovinezza", in a concert program, on the ground that it is unworthy of a place with really great music. For this certain loyal Fascists punished him with bodily violence, an action which, so far as advices go, is still unrebuked by Mussolini.

However, no dictatorial discipline could match in effectiveness the form of reprisal taken by two of Toscanini's most distinguished colleagues: Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Serge Koussevitsky, conductors, respectively, of the Detroit and Boston Symphony orchestras. Both were to have been guest-directors in Italy this Summer, and both have cancelled these engagements as a protest against the affront to Toscanini. The Gabrilowitsch comment on his own action sums the matter up intelligently. Whether or not "Giovinezza" is proper program material is, he says, beside the point. The important thing is that the man generally conceded to be the world's greatest living conductor has been coarsely insulted, and no reparation made by those officially responsible. Koussevitsky emphasizes the same phase of the matter.

Such men as these two are in a peculiarly powerful position from which to exercise influence. Their pre-eminence is more acutely a matter of individual genius than of technical attainment, a fact which makes them irreplaceable in any ordinary sense. The wielding of this influence in the interest of loyalty and idealism is going to elicit applause from a public immeasurably greater than ever crowded the concert halls of Boston and Detroit.

There never, say musicians, has been another Toscanini, and it is quite possible that there never will be another; probably the whole educated world considers him the chief glory of modern Italy. It would seem, then, that even Il Duce, megalomaniac that he is, might see the wisdom of relegating to such a man the last, supreme word in all matters of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE

JUN 3 - 1931

National Rowdyism Rebuked

The refusal of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a series of concerts in Milan has been followed by similar action on the part of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch explains that his feelings have been outraged by the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, who was manhandled and insulted because he refused to play the Fascist Hymn, which he believed to be without artistic merit.

Koussevitsky has cancelled his concert at the Scala Opera House in Milan because of the "unprecedented outrage" to Toscanini and in doing so has declared that "artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and prosecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Unless Premier Mussolini finds it possible to exercise a more effective restraint over his ardent rowdies, the government of which he is the head is destined to forfeit whatever prestige it may have attained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUN 3 - 1931

TOSCANINI AND MUCK.

Chicago, May 28.—I have read about the treatment of Toscanini by the Fascists of Bologna. I presume you don't remember about Dr. Karl Muck in 1917 and what as director of the Boston orchestra he got for saying the "Star Spangled Banner" was not music fit for the orchestra to play.

KARL SEPELL.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 3 - 1931

Toscanini, the Fascist Anthem and Mussolini

By Justin Manin.

FASCISM under Mussolini has persisted in power by tyrannical methods.

The "inalienable rights of man," such as liberty of speech and press, are denied the populace. Censorship and military rule prevail. Taxes are levied with no regard for economics. Intellectuals cannot long endure such oppressive tactics. The rebellious professors, world-renowned historians and former Premiers are exiled. Hence the recent uncalled for and outrageous assault on Arturo Toscanini by the Fascists came as no surprise to the majority of liberal-minded Italians.

Toscanini has been looked upon as a genius. For this reason I am amazed at the little space allowed this incident. Geniuses are benefactors of mankind. No nation retains a special hold on supermen. Only a world-wide protest against this performance involving Toscanini could awaken Fascism to its mistakes. Mankind must acquire the habit of defending animate genius.

The vast majority of the Italian people deeply regretted this attack. Italians, having always been devoted to music and liberty, could not approve such conduct.

The spirit of Mazzini and Garibaldi still lives in the hearts of their countrymen. Liberal-minded Italians are anxiously awaiting the day when they can vindicate their honor.

Pelham, N. Y.

By E. E G.

Your editorial of May 27 about Mr. Toscanini in Italy is evidently the result of misinformation.

Mr. Toscanini has not been and is not being held a prisoner in any manner whatever in Italy. An official communication from Rome stated so last week, saying also that, with the passport in his possession, he is free to go wherever he pleases. Mr. Toscanini himself has telegraphed in the same sense to some of his friends here.

Mr. Toscanini never fails to play the English anthem when in England, and if he likes to try spite work in Italy he has to stand the consequences. The great maestro has a temper of his own that often gets the better of him and he then fails to use common sense. Under the circumstances of Toscanini's case in Bologna how would an American audience meet an arrogant refusal by anybody to play "The Star Spangled Banner"?

New York.

By Jean Riegger.

I wish to express my appreciation of your editorial of May 27 "Mussolini Music" and of Mr. Heywood Broun's column of the previous Monday.

It is only to be regretted that friend Benito is unable to read such excellent comments and be apprised of what rational thinking people really think of him and his Fascism.

It is also most unfortunate that such a deplorable incident as the insult to our universally beloved Maestro Toscanini should be necessary to cause Mussolini to realize, if he did, that art and humans are not to be treated alike.

New York.

By F. Tomaselli.

"Mussolini's" Music" prompts the writer to state that no one has deplored the manner certain irresponsible Fascists treated Toscanini more than the Duce and all sane-minded Fascists and their sympathizers.

The letter forum is for an exchange of opinion among World-Telegram readers. You are invited to write on any subject of current interest. Brief letters are best. Try to keep within 300 words. No letter of controversial nature will be published unless a bona fide name and address is given. Your name will be withheld if you so request.

Are you sure that the act was committed by a Fascist official and that said officer has not been punished? The United Press cables from Italy have not mentioned any officer's name, but referred simply to Fascists.

The proper manner to deal with Toscanini the man—not the genius glory of Italy—was pointed out to us in 1917 at the time the German director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner."

Already once before Toscanini refused to play Italy's national hymn in La Scala Theatre, Milan, which cost him its much cherished leadership.

New York.

By Rulodph Pucelli.

Your editorial, "Mussolini Music," may impress all liberty-lovers, but not those who are unbiased judges of foreign politics.

Before starting an important concert (in a commemoration) a national anthem is almost always requested by good patriots. To refuse to play it means that the conductor (be he Toscanini or any other) is set against the nation or the largest party in his country. The excuse of art exigencies is a rather poor excuse. Had Toscanini accepted the suggestion made to him at Bologna everything would have been all right, nor would Anti-fascists at large have blamed the great conductor.

On the contrary, he got slaps by some excited extremist Fascists and was blamed by all his countrymen who are, more or less, interested in Italy's welfare.

I think that Toscanini's behavior —in this case—was not correct and not worthy of an unmatched musical genius as he is. A little diplomacy and tact do not harm anybody, but often are factors in smoothing rough roads.

New York.

By S. Guzzardi.

The World-Telegram editorial of May 27, "Mussolini Music," calls for comment. Let us consider the matter impartially.

In November the Metropolitan Opera House opens its season and the first evening before the opera begins, in deference to this great nation, the "Star Spangled Banner" is played and the audience respectfully rises. This was done, I believe, in every concert Signor Toscanini has directed in this country. Why does he not refuse to play the American anthem?

Let us examine the kind of government we have to brag about and to show to the world. This nation was created for the free, and the Constitution based on the rights and equality of the people. I learn by the press that almost every amendment and the Constitution itself is constantly violated not only by mere citizens but by high powers in Congress. Why the round-up of "Reds," Radicals, Liberals, aliens, &c., and deportations? These form the 6,000,000 or more of unemployed. Give to them the means for an honest living and all this terroristic propaganda will disappear. Prohibition, the present tariff and unemployment have no excuse to exist in this rich nation.

Why should those "people who wish to retain their self-respect" stay away from Fascist Italy? We know very well that a man like Mussolini is needed in the Presidency of the United States.

New York.

By "Daily Reader."

The editorial "Mussolini Music" does not deserve space in your pages. You have played fair in most editorials, why not in this one?

How would an audience of 100 per cent Americans feel, or what would they do, if a man, let us say, like Paul Whiteman, should refuse to have his orchestra play the national anthem?

[Editorial comment upon the Toscanini incident was based upon press reports of official action in the case. Signor Toscanini's sister has since stated he was not a prisoner in any sense, but had been advised by the police to remain secluded until excitement subsided. She denied also that Signor Toscanini had been deprived of his passport. He was being guarded, she said, for his own protection.—Editor's note.]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILKES BARRE, PA.
NEWS

JUN 4 - 1931

215

to curtail the liberty of Arturo Toscanini because he declined to conduct the Fascist hymn at Bologna, thereby inviting a physical assault from partisans who were more zealous than sensible. Signor Toscanini is one of the outstanding Italians of the day. Except for Il Duce himself, he is probably the best known member of the race internationally, and the most highly regarded as a man of genius. Unquestionably he is the foremost conductor of opera and orchestra extant. His art transcends all racial culture and temperament, and is universal.

To treat such a man as a culprit and place him in duress because he had his own ideas about whether he cared to conduct a certain piece of music would be an absurdity the world would never forget or cease to consider with contempt. It would be a grotesquerie beyond wholly adequate definition. And so Signor Mussolini seems to have viewed the matter.

Whether Il Duce was aided in reaching his decision by protests which were commencing to reach his ears, it is not possible to say. But it is certain that the treatment Signor Toscanini received in Bologna and afterward has had unofficial international reverbations. It is circumstantially reported, for example, that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, abruptly cancelled his engagement to conduct the June festival at La. Scala opera did so as a protest against ved by his fellow artist. , that Koussevitzky is f to all representations s of contract, "pending s." Such an attitude tion that Toscanini was reak of barbarianism, is on to which the artistic be most sensitive, and em most.

IPPING FROM NCE, MASS.
GRAM

le to The Herald)
31—Serge Koussevit-he Boston Symphony refused to conduct a rts in Milan after he Fascist attack on Ar-and the seizure of the made public today

e wrote to the direc-
la theatre, informing ision not to fulfil his etter reads:
I have learned from unprecedented been perpetrated your country, deeply hurt the
you to liberament which I ac-of June.
does not be-

Mussolini Music

Mussolini got excited some months ago over the adverse publicity he received in this country from a speech by General Pershing. His machines. Il Duce had enough bluff to make the state department bow to him.

But how is Mussolini going to censor American opinion of the Toscanini incident? That has revealed the Fascist dictatorship in all its cheap and cruel futility. Many Americans, especially of the wealthy class which has tended to admire the dictator, are more enraged by the mistreatment of the great conductor than by all the Fascist murders of labor leaders and liberals.

As a conductor in New York and on tour, Signor Toscanini has won the admiration and loyalty of tens of thousands of music lovers in the United States. They resent the indignities which he has suffered from the dictatorship of his own country.

Because he exercised his right as a free man and as a musician, in declining an impertinent demand to add a tawdry Fascist anthem to his concert at Bologna, he was knocked down by a Fascist official.

Mussolini, instead of punishing the subordinate, has sanctioned the assault by withdrawing Toscanini's passport and holding him a virtual prisoner.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has canceled a concert engagement in Milan in protest against this "unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

It is hardly to be expected, however, that such boycotts and bad publicity will change the nature of the Mussolini dictatorship. The moral, apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

engagement in levable outrage ver, that such the nature of apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

JUN 2 - 1931

Appropriately Answered.

Fascist hysteria as directed recently at Bologna against Arturo Toscanini has been answered by his colleagues in such a way as to appeal not only to the musically sophisticated, but to everybody who appreciates an exhibition of good sportsmanship.

The famous musician, it will be recalled, declined to include the official Fascist song, "Giovinezza", in a concert program, on the ground that it is unworthy of a place with really great music. For this certain loyal Fascists punished him with bodily violence, an action which, so far as advices go, is still unrebuked by Mussolini.

However, no dictatorial discipline could match in effectiveness the form of reprisal taken by two of Toscanini's most distinguished colleagues: Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Serge Koussevitsky, conductors, respectively, of the Detroit and Boston Symphony orchestras. Both were to have been guest-directors in Italy this Summer, and both have cancelled these engagements as a protest against the affront to Toscanini. The Gabrilowitsch comment on his own action sums the matter up intelligently. Whether or not "Giovinezza" is proper program material is, he says, beside the point. The important thing is that the man generally conceded to be the world's greatest living conductor has been coarsely insulted, and no reparation made by those officially responsible. Koussevitsky emphasizes the same phase of the matter.

Such men as these two are in a peculiarly powerful position from which to exercise influence. Their pre-eminence is more acutely a matter of individual genius than of technical attainment, a fact which makes them irreplaceable in any ordinary sense. The wielding of this influence in the interest of loyalty and idealism is going to elicit applause from a public immeasurably greater than ever crowded the concert halls of Boston and Detroit.

There never, say musicians, has been another Toscanini, and it is quite possible that there never will be another; probably the whole educated world considers him the chief glory of modern Italy. It would seem, then, that even Il Duce, megalomaniac that he is, might see the wisdom of relegating to such a man the last, supreme word in all matters of music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE

JUN 3 - 1931

National Rowdyism Rebuked

The refusal of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a series of concerts in Milan has been followed by similar action on the part of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch explains that his feelings have been outraged by the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, who was manhandled and insulted because he refused to play the Fascist Hymn, which he believed to be without artistic merit.

Koussevitsky has cancelled his concert at the Scala Opera House in Milan because of the "unprecedented outrage" to Toscanini and in doing so has declared that "artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and prosecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Unless Premier Mussolini finds it possible to exercise a more effective restraint over his ardent rowdies, the government of which he is the head is destined to forfeit whatever prestige it may have attained.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUN 3 - 1931

TOSCANINI AND MUCK.

Chicago, May 28.—I have read about the treatment of Toscanini by the Fascists of Bologna. I presume you don't remember about Dr. Karl Muck in 1917 and what as director of the Boston orchestra he got for saying the "Star Spangled Banner" was not music fit for the orchestra to play.

KARL SEPELL.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 3 - 1931

Toscanini, the Fascist

By Justin Manin.

FASCISM under Mussolini has persisted in power by tyrannical methods.

The "inalienable rights of man," such as liberty of speech and press, are denied the populace. Censorship and military rule prevail. Taxes are levied with no regard for [illegible] nomics. Intellectuals canno[illegible] endure such oppressive tact[illegible] rebellious professors, [illegible] nowned historians a[illegible] miers are exiled. He[illegible] uncalled for and outr[illegible] assault on Arturo Toscanini by the Fascists came as no surprise to the majority of liberal-minded Italians.

Toscanini has been looked upon as a genius. For this reason I am amazed at the little space allowed this incident. Geniuses are benefactors of mankind. No nation retains a special hold on supermen. Only a world-wide protest against this performance involving Toscanini could awaken Fascism to its mistakes. Mankind must acquire the habit of defending animate genius.

The vast majority of the Italian people deeply regretted this attack. Italians, having always been devoted to music and liberty, could not approve such conduct.

The spirit of Mazzini and Garibaldi still lives in the hearts of their countrymen. Liberal-minded Italians are anxiously awaiting the day when they can vindicate their honor.

Pelham, N. Y.

The letter forum[illegible] change of opini[illegible] Telegram r[illegible] invited to [illegible] current [illegible] subject of [illegible] are brief letters [illegible] keep within [illegible] letter of con[illegible] ture will be pub[illegible] ess a bona fide name [illegible] address is given. Your [illegible] will be withheld if you [illegible] request.

By E. E G.

Your editorial of May 27 about Mr. Toscanini in Italy is evidently the result of misinformation.

Mr. Toscanini has not been and is not being held a prisoner in any manner whatever in Italy. An official communication from Rome stated so last week, saying also that, with the passport in his possession, he is free to go wherever he pleases. Mr. Toscanini himself has telegraphed in the same sense to some of his friends here.

Mr. Toscanini never fails to play the English anthem when in England, and if he likes to try spite work in Italy he has to stand the consequences. The great maestro has a temper of his own that often gets the better of him and he then fails to use common sense. Under the circumstances of Toscanini's case in Bologna how would an American audience meet an arrogant refusal by anybody to play "The Star Spangled Banner"?

New York.

By Jean Riegger.

I wish to express my appreciation of your editorial of May 27 "Mussolini Music" and of Mr. Heywood Broun's column of the previous Monday.

It is only to be regretted that friend Benito is unable to read such excellent comments and be apprised of what rational thinking people really think of him and his Fascism.

It is also most unfortunate that such a deplorable incident as the insult to our universally beloved Maestro Toscanini should be necessary to cause Mussolini to realize, if he did, that art and humans are not to be treated alike.

New York.

By F. Tomaselli.

"Mussolini's" Music" prompts the writer to state that no one has deplored the manner certain irresponsible Fascists treated Toscanini more than the Duce and all sane-minded Fascists and their sympathizers.

Are you sure that the act was committed by a Fascist official and that said officer has not been punished? The United Press cables from Italy have not mentioned any officer's name, but referred simply to Fascists.

The proper manner to deal with Toscanini the man—not the genius glory of Italy—was pointed out to us in 1917 at the time the German director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra refused to play "The Star Spangled Banner."

Already once before Toscanini refused to play Italy's national hymn in La Scala Theatre, Milan, which cost him its much cherished leadership.

New York.

By Rulodph Pucelli.

Your editorial, "Mussolini Music," may impress all liberty-lovers, but not those who are unbiased [illegible] law—I mean the law of supply [illegible]

68 TO BE GRADUATED AT MILITARY SCHOOL

New York Academy at Cornwall Will Hold Commencement Exercises This Week.

Special to The World-Telegram.

CORNWALL-ON-HUDSON, N. Y., June 3.—The forty-second annual commencement exercises of New York Military Academy will be held here this week, beginning with the final guard mount at 5 P. M. tomorrow and ending with the last parade at 1:30 P. M. Saturday. The program includes military exhibitions, Troop "D" horse show, dress parade and graduation hop on Friday, and the award of commissions and warrants.

The graduation class, which will be addressed by Dr. H. Percy Silver, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, New York City, comprises sixty-eight students, many of whom are from Greater New York. Others are from as far south as Birmingham, Ala., while one is from Ancon, Canal Zone.

URGES KNICKERS IN CHURCH.

Special to The World-Telegram.

WHITE PLAINS, June 3.—An 8 A. M. service for sportsmen at which sports garb will be the accepted thing, will be inaugurated Sunday, by the Rev. Arthur Stanley at the Congregational Church in the high[illegible] [illegible] play [illegible] American anthem?

Let us examine the kind of government we have to brag about and to show to the world. This nation was created for the free, and the Constitution based on the rights and equality of the people. I learn by the press that almost every amendment and the Constitution itself is constantly violated not only by mere citizens but by high powers

[illegible] engagement in [illegible] evable outrage

[illegible] ver, that such [illegible] the nature of [illegible] apparently, is that those who wish to retain their self-respect and freedom should stay away from Fascist Italy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WILKES BARRE, PA.
NEWS

215

JUN 4 - 1931

TOSCANINI'S PLIGHT

It never seemed credible that the Mussolini government would seriously undertake to curtail the liberty of Arturo Toscanini because he declined to conduct the Fascist hymn at Bologna, thereby inviting a physical assault from partisans who were more zealous than sensible. Signor Toscanini is one of the outstanding Italians of the day. Except for Il Duce himself, he is probably the best known member of the race internationally, and the most highly regarded as a man of genius. Unquestionably he is the foremost conductor of opera and orchestra extant. His art transcends all racial culture and temperament, and is universal.

To treat such a man as a culprit and place him in duress because he had his own ideas about whether he cared to conduct a certain piece of music would be an absurdity the world would never forget or cease to consider with contempt. It would be a grotesquerie beyond wholly adequate definition. And so Signor Mussolini seems to have viewed the matter.

Whether Il Duce was aided in reaching his decision by protests which were commencing to reach his ears, it is not possible to say. But it is certain that the treatment Signor Toscanini received in Bologna and afterward has had unofficial international reverbations. It is circumstantially reported, for example, that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, abruptly cancelled his engagement to conduct the June festival at La Scala opera house in Milan and did so as a protest against the treatment received by his fellow artist. It is understood, too, that Koussevitzky is showing himself deaf to all representations about the obligations of contract, "pending further developments." Such an attitude conveying in implication that Toscanini was the victim of an outbreak of barbarianism, is the sort of implication to which the artistic Italian people would be most sensitive, and which would hurt them most.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELGRAM

JUN [illegible]

(Special Cable to The Herald)

PARIS, May 31—Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's passport, made public today a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala theatre, informing them of his decision not to fulfil his contract. The letter reads:

"Gentlemen: I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

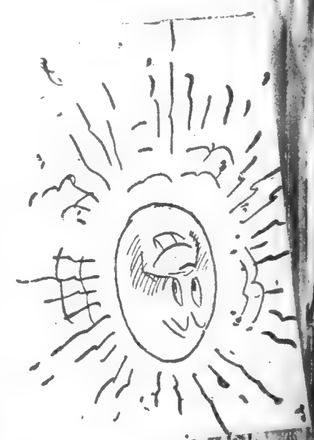
"Maestro Toscanini does not belong in Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

M. Koussevitzky said in an interview:

"I have suffered too much from bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascists are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

Lone Bandit Kills C. C. Frye, Storekeeper at Town of Seybert.

Lagrange, Ind., June 6.—One of the most intensive man hunts in the history of Lagrange county was under way today for a bandit who brutally shot and killed Bert C. Frye, aged 52, storekeeper at Seybert, a village near here, Friday night. [illegible] on the the-



[illegible] freedom should stay awa[illegible]

2.16
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
Rockland, Me.
(10) JUN 6 1931

THE REALM OF MUSIC

Gladys St. Clair Morgan

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of theh Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's pass-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 7 1931

Master of the Bull Fiddle.

MUSICIANS are having more than their usual share of headlines these days—and on front pages, too. On Page 1 have been chronicled within the last few days Sir Edward Elgar's baronetcy, a wild automobile ride by Paderewski from a concert to a liner whose sailing with government permission had been delayed two hours just for him, Toscanini's difficulties with Bologna Fascists. And now, as a gesture of sympathy with Toscanini, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has declined to fill an engagement with La Scala in Milan.

Italy is not the first country Mr. Koussevitsky has declined to visit; he boycotts his own native land. "I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini affair recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

But it was not all politics which compelled Koussevitsky to leave Russia. "There is no chance there for artistic endeavor," he explained. "I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. We were cold and wore our mittens."

Bass Violinist.

Now, an orchestra in mittens must have been as ineffectual as employing thumbs upon dial telephones. Koussevitsky went to Paris, where there were no mittens, and then he came to Boston, where mittens are not unknown but are reserved for the very young.

Although he is in the front rank of great orchestral conductors of the world, Koussevitsky stands alone as virtuoso of the bass [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
JUN 8 - 1931

MUSICAL WAR ON FASCISM

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, refuses to keep a scheduled concert engagement at Milan, Italy. The refusal is based on the Toscanini incident, which M. Koussevitsky brands "an unbelievable outrage against the whole artistic world."

Premier Mussolini and the Fascists are apt to discover that they started something of serious proportions when they withdrew Toscanini's passport and held the famed director a virtual prisoner because of his failure to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert.

Ordinarily, great artists are little concerned with politics. Even a Mussolini dictatorship does not usually loom large in the mentality of a genius.

But the doughty Italian leader now seems about to realize that there is a sort of unwritten code of loyalty within the realm of art. Fascism, imitating the policy of the old Roman Emperors with regard to cultural pursuits, will not exactly relish the musical boycott which is likely to be instituted by Toscanini's indignant friends.

port, has made public a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala Theatre informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract. The letter reads:

"I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist of your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"Maestro Toscanini does not belong to Italy, but to the whole world as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Mr. Koussevitzky in an interview said: "I have suffered too much from Bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascisti are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
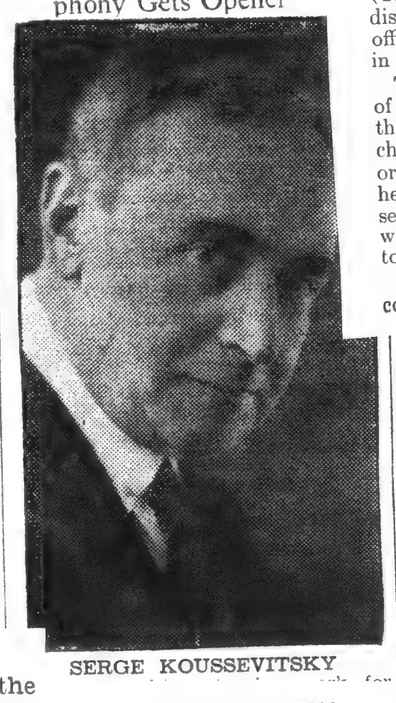
TIMES
JUN 7 - 1931

Early Star For Mu

Buffalo Foundation Arrangi Concert; Koussevitzky Sym phony Gets Opener



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
MAY 31 1931

Monteux Figures In New Volume

Artistic achievements of Pierre Monteux, celebrated French conductor, as leader of the Boston Symphony are a major subject in the recently published history of the orchestra, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931" (New York: Houghton, Mifflin) by M. A. De Wolfe Howe.

Monteux, who has during the last few years been co-leader with Willem Mengelberg of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and a director of outstanding Paris Symphony organizations, is being brought back to America this summer to conduct concerts of the San Francisco Summer Symphony Association and the Philharmonic Society of San Mateo County.

The Phonophile's Bookshelf

To the Memory of Henry Higginson

Henry Higginson

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1881-1931. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. Semi-centennial Edition. Boston. Houghton Mifflin Co. 272 pages, $2.50.

The great Boston orchestra has ended its fiftieth year of existence in a blaze of glory and it is not unfitting that to commemorate the semicentenial this comprehensive volume should have been completely revised and supplemented in collaboration with John N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff.

The book is prefaced with a reproduction of the Sargei painting of Colonel Higginson and the entire work reflec this beginning even as the orchestra does his remarkable for sight and judgment in creating one of America's greate artistic organizations. For it was he who made it possib and carried it through until the time when, laden with tl cares of war and the sadness of the misunderstanding abou Dr. Muck he gave it into the hands of a board of trustee (The Muck episode, by the way, is briefly but exceedingl discreetly mentioned. Tardy as it is, this belated sem official exoneration of Muck might well have been couche in more certain and less politic terms.)

The record tells of war-time difficulties, the short tenur of Rabaud, the constructive work of Monteux not only agains the abortive strike and the subsequent re-building of the o chestra b public of th orchestra of Spring wa heard, an Serge Kous sevitsky ed this yea with the ks in repe toire and

The ap ete and we compiled, ned through out fifty years by the orchestra, the soloists, members of the orchestra and conductors, Bliss Perry's memorable address on Colonel Higginson, and a catalogue of the Casadeus collection of ancient instruments.

Phonophiles will note with interest the complete list of the records by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the outside cover and will perhaps wonder why it was not made a permanent part of the book and why there is no reference to the recordings issued several years ago under Dr. Muck's baton.

The original edition of Mr. Howe's book has long been one of the most important histories of a leading American orchestra. The present revision brings it up to date in interesting and informative fashion.

RICHARDSON BROWN

Fifty Years of the Boston Orchestra

To commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the B ton Symphony Orchestra Houghton-Mifflin has b out a new edition of M. A. DeWolf Howe's "Th ton Symphony Orchestra," with the new dates 1931. The volume has been revised and extended contains account of the war years and the lates umphs under Serge Koussevitzky. The able pres representative at Symphony Hall, John Burk, has orated on the last chapters and many of the inci make fascinating reading.

Probably no symphonic organization has had dramatic moments than the Boston Symphony O tra. The famous incident of the "Star Spangled ner," which was twisted out of shape by a pro editor to throw Dr. Muck into a bad light, his su removal and arrest for charges never made pu final relinquishing of the orchestra by Major H the assumption of the management by a board tees, the appearances of Henri Rabaud, and the ning of the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, w ensuing strike in the ranks and the final tri French conductor, especially with his epoch-making formances of "Le Sacre du Printemps"— all make that no fiction could equal.

The record goes on to tell of Serge Kous vitzk festivals he has added to the large schedu and the crowning glory of the fiftieth when George Henschel was recalled to condu first concert of the season as he had fifty yea when the orchestra had its beginnings.

The appendices contain Bliss Perry's address Colonel Higginson, the complete repertoire of t

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
MAY 30 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TELLS STORY OF ITS FIFTY YEARS

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY publishes the history of its fifty years of activity. It notes the distinguished Europeans who have stood on the conductor's dais since Georg Henschel inaugurated the first season in 1881. It lists an imposing repertoire that, like the vast number of symphonic works performed by our own orchestra, included practically the whole of the literature.

But one is impressed, not so much by the achievements, which are no more than those of any celebrated symphonic ensemble and must, by reason of the limitations of time and place, be less than the historic institutions of Europe can boast, but rather by the spirit that has animated this earliest of American symphonies from its beginning.

* * *

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA was founded and sustained to spread abroad and to foster the love of music; "to make available a vast field of beauty to persons who, having little other enjoyment, have need of this sunshine."

These words of the founder of the Boston orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, have cleared up for me a misunderstanding of the institution. I have thought that the first American orchestra might have had a bit of nationalism in its plan and purpose. But it seems that in Boston music is made for art and humanity in the broadest sense.

* * *

FORTUNATELY the American mus[illegible]not excluded from the latter classification, though Maj. Higginson once said that musicians are not like other men and must be treated differently. On that score the American musician cannot complain. He has not been treated like the American manufacturer, or the American workman, either in Boston or elsewhere. No patriotic impulse is stirred in his behalf anywhere in this broad land despite the admitted "grayness" of American life and its need for "vast fields of beauty," which, with a little encouragement, the native musician might provide.

* * *

EVEN in Boston it was found impossible to exclude the American composer entirely, though the American executive, except in the rare capacity of soloist, was rigorously frowned upon. Thus Boston has had nine famous conductors. Five have been German—Henschel, Gericke, Paur, Muck and Fiedler. Two, Rabaud and Monteaux, were French and came after the war. One, the greatest of them all, was Austro-Hungarian, Arthur Nikisch, and the present incumbent is a Russian, Koussevitzky.

But during its fifty years of activity the Boston Symphony has found a place for fifty-eight American composers on its programs. Some, like Chadwick and Foote, had practically their whole output performed. Being native Bostonians, they were not quite as other Americans.

Carpenter, Stock and Sowerby have represented Chicago. Brockway, Schelling, Hanson, Hadley and Hill have represented New York. But I gather that the American elements in the Boston programs have been less numerous under Koussevitzky's reign than heretofore. However, the Boston critics, like no others in the world, are in complete agreement as to Dr. Koussevitzky and his talents, a circumstance that is significant of the power of the man and of the spirit of the city.

Mixing Art and Politics

MIXING politics with art seems as sensible as alcohol with gasoline. Little good can be expected from either process. In war time, of course, art can escape the chauvinistic hysteria no better than other human activities. The enemy's music will be barred from concert halls and opera houses, his paintings from the galleries, his books from the libraries and his plays from the theaters. His conductors will be interned or expelled as enemy aliens. Citizens who protest will be denounced as traitors.

In peace time, one might think, such things would be impossible. Yet in Russia today, pictures, plays, books, and musical compositions are judged primarily not by their artistic qualities but by their usefulness in teaching the Communist doctrine. Recently, a determined effort was made to prevent Felix Weingartner from conducting concerts in Paris, on the ground that he had been hostile to France during the World War. And still more recently, Arturo Toscanini was assaulted and later deprived of his passport because he refused to play the Fascist hymn or the royal Italian march at an orchestral concert in Bologna.

Like other attempts at suppression or regimentation, these practices in the long run bring their own penalty and defeat their own ends. The Soviet policy toward art may help to make converts to Communism, but it certainly will nullify Russian art production so long as it continues in force. The attempt to bar Weingartner from Paris gave his concerts an enormous amount of free advertising and resulted in a triumph for the Austrian visitor.

And what will be the result of the persecution of Toscanini in Italy? Already Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of his most distinguished colleagues, with a splendid gesture has canceled his appearances at a festival to be held at La Scala in Milan in June because of what he described as the "unbelievable outrage" at Bologna; and in reply to the manager's protest that there was insufficient reason for the cancellation, the Boston conductor replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

When, in the judgment of the Italian Government, Toscanini has been sufficiently "disciplined," presumably his passport will be returned to him. Then the conductor will journey to Bayreuth to conduct, and next fall will return to fill his engagement in New York. Is it likely that he will be eager again to subject himself to affront and injury by appearing as conductor in his native land?

Thus, it will be observed, the principal results of the Italian "discipline" probably will have been to deprive Italians of the services of two of the foremost conductors of the time, and to strengthen in the rest of the world misgivings concerning a political creed which fosters such interference with art.

June 1931, Vol. V. No. 9

The Phonophile's Bookshelf

To the Memory of Henry Higginson

Henry Higginson

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1881-1931. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. Semi-centennial Edition. Boston. Houghton Mifflin Co. 272 pages, $2.50.

The great Boston orchestra has ended its fiftieth year of existence in a blaze of glory and it is not unfitting that to commemorate the semicentenial this comprehensive volume should have been completely revised and supplemented in collaboration with John N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff.

The book is prefaced with a reproduction of the Sargent painting of Colonel Higginson and the entire work reflects this beginning even as the orchestra does his remarkable foresight and judgment in creating one of America's greatest artistic organizations. For it was he who made it possible and carried it through until the time when, laden with the cares of war and the sadness of the misunderstanding about Dr. Muck he gave it into the hands of a board of trustees. (The Muck episode, by the way, is briefly but exceedingly discreetly mentioned. Tardy as it is, this belated semi-official exoneration of Muck might well have been couched in more certain and less politic terms.)

The record tells of war-time difficulties, the short tenure of Rabaud, the constructive work of Monteux not only against the abortive strike and the subsequent re-building of the orchestra but against the indifference of the large public of the orchestra until the resounding tread of the Rite of Spring was heard, and finally the latter day triumphs of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and his festival activities which crowned this year with the Bach Festival and new highwater marks in repertoire and performance.

The appendices, which are remarkably complete and well compiled, comprise complete lists of works performed throughout fifty years by the orchestra, the soloists, members of the orchestra and conductors, Bliss Perry's memorable address on Colonel Higginson, and a catalogue of the Casadeus callection of ancient instruments.

Phonophiles will note with interest the complete list of the records by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the outside cover and will perhaps wonder why it was not made a permanent part of the book and why there is no reference to the recordings issued several years ago under Dr. Muck's baton.

The original edition of Mr. Howe's book has long been one of the most important histories of a leading American orchestra. The present revision brings it up to date in interesting and informative fashion.

RICHARDSON BROWN

Fifty Years of the Boston Orchestra

To commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Houghton-Mifflin has brought out a new edition of M. A. DeWolf Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," with the new dates 1881-1931. The volume has been revised and extended and contains account of the war years and the latest triumphs under Serge Koussevitzky. The able press representative at Symphony Hall, John Burk, has collaborated on the last chapters and many of the incidents make fascinating reading.

Probably no symphonic organization has had more dramatic moments than the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The famous incident of the "Star Spangled Banner," which was twisted out of shape by a pro-British editor to throw Dr. Muck into a bad light, his subsequent removal and arrest for charges never made public, the final relinquishing of the orchestra by Major Higginson, the assumption of the management by a board of trustees, the appearances of Henri Rabaud, and the beginning of the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, with the ensuing strike in the ranks and the final triumph of the French conductor, especially with his epoch-making performances of "Le Sacre du Printemps"—all make a truth that no fiction could equal.

The record goes on to tell of Serge Koussevitzky, the festivals he has added to the large schedule of concerts and the crowning glory of the fiftieth year, when Sir George Henschel was recalled to conduct the first concert of the season as he had fifty years ago when the orchestra had its beginnings.

The appendices contain Bliss Perry's address about Colonel Higginson, the complete repertoire of the orchestra, a list of conductors, soloists and personnel together with a catalogue of the Casadesus collection of old musical instruments.

RICHARDSON BROWN

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GAZETTE Rockland, Me. (10) JUN 6 1931

THE REALM OF MUSIC

Gladys St. Clair Morgan

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of theh Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's pass-

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK TIMES JUN 7 1931

Master of the Bull Fiddle.

MUSICIANS are having more than their usual share of headlines these days—and on front pages, too. On Page 1 have been chronicled within the last few days Sir Edward Elgar's baronetcy, a wild automobile ride by Paderewski from a concert to a liner whose sailing with government permission had been delayed two hours just for him, Toscanini's difficulties with Bologna Fascists. And now, as a gesture of sympathy with Toscanini, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has declined to fill an engagement with La Scala in Milan.

Italy is not the first country Mr. Koussevitsky has declined to visit; he boycotts his own native land. "I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini affair recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

But it was not all politics which compelled Koussevitsky to leave Russia. "There is no chance there for artistic endeavor," he explained. "I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. We were cold and wore our mittens."

Bass Violinist.

Now, an orchestra in mittens must have been as ineffectual as employing thumbs upon dial telephones. Koussevitsky went to Paris, where there were no mittens, and then he came to Boston, where mittens are not unknown but are reserved for the very young.

Although he is in the front rank of great orchestral conductors of the world, Koussevitsky stands alone as virtuoso of the bass viol. It is difficult to believe that the big bull fiddle, the oom-pah-pah instrument of the strings, could be elevated to a solo part and to the dignity of a Carnegie Hall recital, but under Koussevitsky's fingers and bowing it has achieved that place.

* * *

port, has made public a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala Theatre informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract. The letter reads:

"I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist of your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

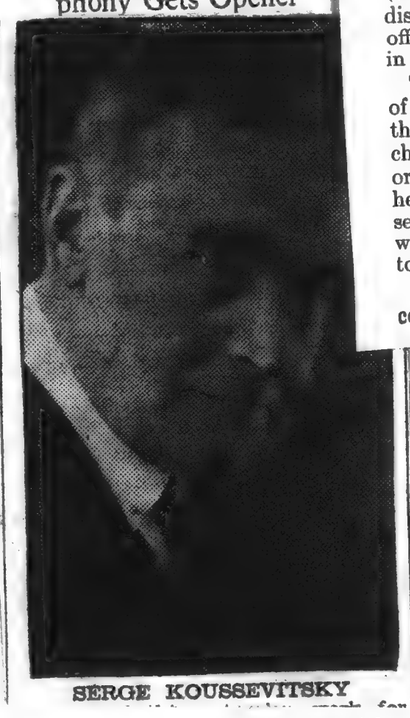
"Maestro Toscanini does not belong to Italy, but to the whole world as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Mr. Koussevitzky in an interview said: "I have suffered too much from Bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascisti are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y. TIMES JUN 7 - 1931

Early Star For Mu

Buffalo Foundation Arrang Concert; Koussevitzky Syn phony Gets Opener



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL. CHRONICLE MAY 31 1931

Monteux Figures In New Volume

Artistic achievements of Pierre Monteux, celebrated French conductor, as leader of the Boston Symphony are a major subject in the recently published history of the orchestra, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931" (New York: Houghton, Mifflin) by M. A. De Wolfe Howe.

Monteux, who has during the last few years been co-leader with Willem Mengelberg of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and a director of outstanding Paris Symphony organizations, is being brought back to America this summer to conduct concerts of the San Francisco Summer Symphony Association and the Philharmonic Society of San Mateo County.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY publishes the history of its fifty years of activity. It notes the distinguished Europeans who have stood on the conductor's dais since Georg Henschel inaugurated the first season in 1881. It lists an imposing repertoire that, like the vast number of symphonic works performed by our own orchestra, included practically the whole of the literature.

But one is impressed, not so much by the achievements, which are no more than those of any celebrated symphonic ensemble and must, by reason of the limitations of time and place, be less than the historic institutions of Europe can boast, but rather by the spirit that has animated this earliest of American symphonies from its beginning.

* * *

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA was founded and sustained to spread abroad and to foster the love of music; "to make available a vast field of beauty to persons who, having little other enjoyment, have need of this sunshine."

These words of the founder of the Boston orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, have cleared up for me a misunderstanding of the institution. I have thought that the first American orchestra might have had a bit of nationalism in its plan and purpose. But it seems that in Boston music is made for art and humanity in the broadest sense.

* * *

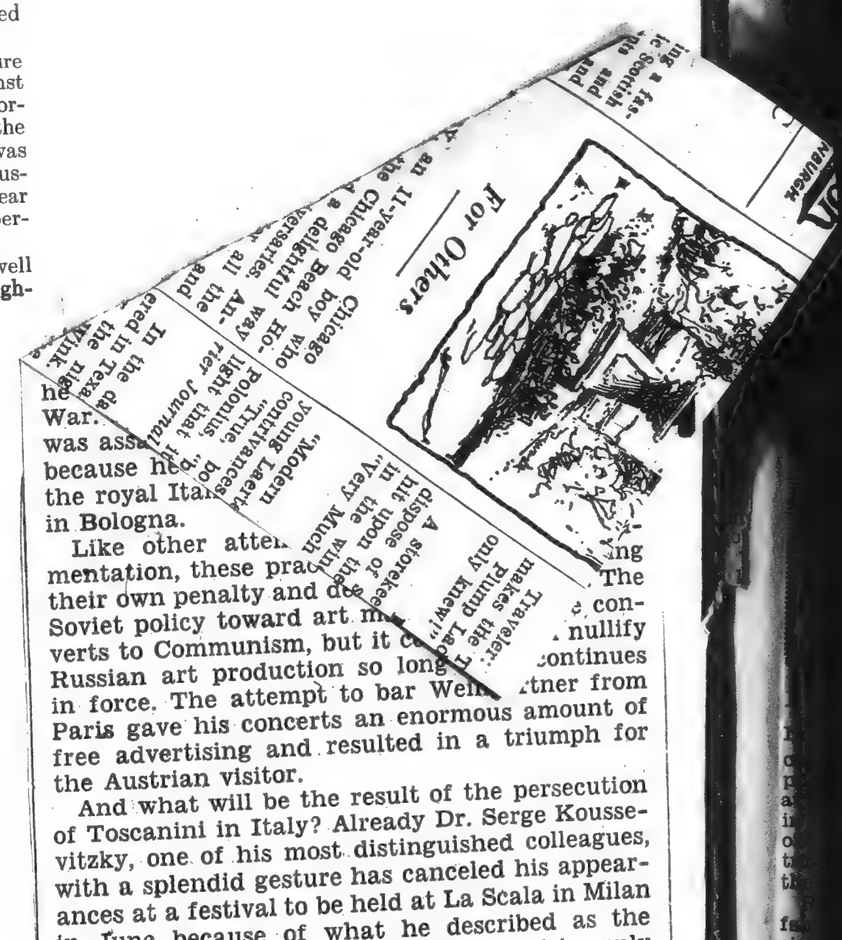
FORTUNATELY the American mu[illegible] not excluded from the latter classification, though Maj. Higginson once said that musicians are not like other men and must be treated differently. On that score the American musician cannot complain. He has not been treated like the American manufacturer, or the American workman, either in Boston or elsewhere. No patriotic impulse is stirred in his behalf anywhere in this broad land despite the admitted "grayness" of American life and its need for "vast fields of beauty," which, with a little encouragement, the native musician might provide.

* * *

EVEN in Boston it was found impossible to exclude the American composer entirely, though the American executive, except in the rare capacity of soloist, was rigorously frowned upon. Thus Boston has had nine famous conductors. Five have been German—Henschel, Gericke, Paur, Muck and Fiedler. Two, Rabaud and Monteaux, were French and came after the war. One, the greatest of them all, was Austro-Hungarian, Arthur Nikisch, and the present incumbent is a Russian, Koussevitzky.

But during its fifty years of activity the Boston Symphony has found a place for fifty-eight American composers on its programs. Some, like Chadwick and Foote, had practically their whole output performed. Being native Bostonians, they were not quite as other Americans.

Carpenter, Stock and Sowerby have represented Chicago. Brockway, Schelling, Hanson, Hadley and Hill have represented New York. But I gather that the American elements in the Boston programs have been less numerous under Koussevitzky's reign than heretofore. However, the Boston critics, like no others in the world, are in complete agreement as to Dr. Koussevitzky and his talents, a circumstance that is significant of the power of the man and of the spirit of the city.



cists rted hen and ris-

[illegible] because of his failure to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert.

Ordinarily, great artists are little concerned with politics. Even a Mussolini dictatorship does not usually loom large in the mentality of a genius.

But the doughty Italian leader now seems about to realize that there is a sort of unwritten code of loyalty within the realm of art. Fascism, imitating the policy of the old Roman Emperors with regard to cultural pursuits, will not exactly relish the musical boycott which is likely to be instituted by Toscanini's indignant friends.

he War. was ass[illegible] because he[illegible] the royal Ita[illegible] in Bologna.

Like other atte[illegible]ng mentation, these pra[illegible] The their own penalty and de[illegible] con- Soviet policy toward art m[illegible] nullify verts to Communism, but it c[illegible] continues Russian art production so long[illegible]rtner from in force. The attempt to bar Wei[illegible] Paris gave his concerts an enormous amount of free advertising and resulted in a triumph for the Austrian visitor.

And what will be the result of the persecution of Toscanini in Italy? Already Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of his most distinguished colleagues, with a splendid gesture has canceled his appearances at a festival to be held at La Scala in Milan in June because of what he described as the "unbelievable outrage" at Bologna; and in reply to the manager's protest that there was insufficient reason for the cancellation, the Boston conductor replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

When, in the judgment of the Italian Government, Toscanini has been sufficiently "disciplined," presumably his passport will be returned to him. Then the conductor will journey to Bayreuth to conduct, and next fall will return to fill his engagement in New York. Is it likely that he will be eager again to subject himself to affront and injury by appearing as conductor in his native land?

Thus, it will be observed, the principal results of the Italian "discipline" probably will have been to deprive Italians of the services of two of the foremost conductors of the time, and to strengthen in the rest of the world misgivings concerning a political creed which fosters such interference with art.

CLIPPING FROM THE GAZETTE Rockland, Me.
(10) JUN 6 1931

THE REALM OF MUSIC

Gladys St. Clair Morgan

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of theh Boston Symphony Orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's pass-

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK TIMES JUN 7 1931

Master of the Bull Fiddle.

MUSICIANS are having more than their usual share of headlines these days—and on front pages, too. On Page 1 have been chronicled within the last few days Sir Edward Elgar's baronetcy, a wild automobile ride by Paderewski from a concert to a liner whose sailing with government permission had been delayed two hours just for him, Toscanini's difficulties with Bologna Fascists. And now, as a gesture of sympathy with Toscanini, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has declined to fill an engagement with La Scala in Milan.

Italy is not the first country Mr. Koussevitsky has declined to visit; he boycotts his own native land. "I have always tried to keep politics out of art," he said. "The Toscanini affair recalls certain phenomena in Soviet Russia, which I have quit."

But it was not all politics which compelled Koussevitsky to leave Russia. "There is no chance there for artistic endeavor," he explained. "I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. We were cold and wore our mittens."

Bass Violinist.

Now, an orchestra in mittens must have been as ineffectual as employing thumbs upon dial telephones. Koussevitsky went to Paris, where there were no mittens, and then he came to Boston, where mittens are not unknown but are reserved for the very young.

Although he is in the front rank of great orchestral conductors of the world, Koussevitsky stands alone as virtuoso of the bass viol. It is difficult to believe that the big bull fiddle, the oom-pah-pah instrument of the strings, could be elevated to a solo part and to the dignity of a Carnegie Hall recital, but under Koussevitsky's fingers and bowing it has achieved that place.

* * *

port, has made public a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala Theatre informing them of his decision not to fulfill his contract. The letter reads:

"I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist of your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

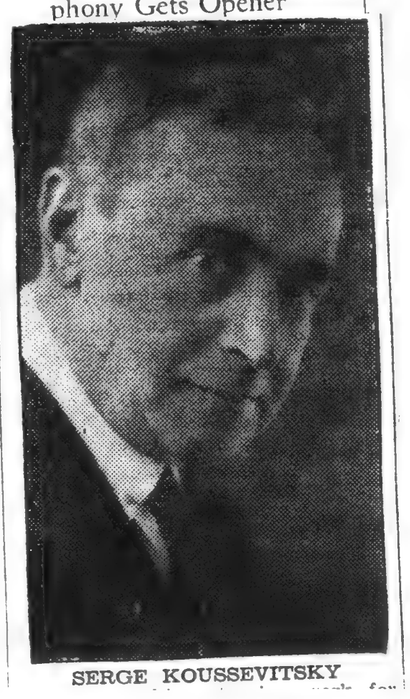
"Maestro Toscanini does not belong to Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

Mr. Koussevitzky in an interview said: "I have suffered too much from Bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascisti are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y. TIMES JUN 7 1931

Early Start For Musi

Buffalo Foundation Arranging Concert; Koussevitzky Symphony Gets Opener



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL. CHRONICLE MAY 31 1931

...scists ...arted ...when ...and ...pris-

...oner because of his failure to play the Fascist hymn at a public concert.

Ordinarily, great artists are little concerned with politics. Even a Mussolini dictatorship does not usually loom large in the mentality of a genius.

But the doughty Italian leader now seems about to realize that there is a sort of unwritten code of loyalty within the realm of art. Fascism, imitating the policy of the old Roman Emperors with regard to cultural pursuits, will not exactly relish the musical boycott which is likely to be instituted by Toscanini's indignant friends.

Monteux Figures In New Volume

Artistic achievements of Pierre Monteux, celebrated French conductor, as leader of the Boston Symphony are a major subject in the recently published history of the orchestra, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931" (New York: Houghton, Mifflin) by M. A. De Wolfe Howe.

Monteux, who has during the last few years been co-leader with Willem Mengelberg of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and a director of outstanding Paris Symphony organizations, is being brought back to America this summer to conduct concerts of the San Francisco Summer Symphony Association and the Philharmonic Society of San Mateo County.

The Phonophile's Bookshelf

To the Memory of Henry Higginson

Henry Higginson

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1881-1931. By M. A. ...e Howe. Semi-centennial Edition. Boston. Houghton ...o. 272 pages, $2.50.

...eat Boston orchestra has ended its fiftieth year of ...in a blaze of glory and it is not unfitting that to ...ate the semicentenial this comprehensive volume ... been completely revised and supplemented in col... ...ith John N. Burk of the Symphony Hall staff.

...is prefaced with a reproduction of the Sargent ...Colonel Higginson and the entire work reflects ...even as the orchestra does his remarkable fore... ...lgment in creating one of America's greatest ...tions. For it was he who made it possible ...hrough until the time when, laden with the ... the sadness of the misunderstanding about ...e it into the hands of a board of trustees. ...de, by the way, is briefly but exceedingly ...ed. Tardy as it is, this belated semi... ...of Muck might well have been couched ...less politic terms.)

...f war-time difficulties, the short tenure ...ictive work of Monteux not only against ...d the subsequent re-building of the or... ...indifference of the large public of the ...nding tread of the Rite of Spring was ...tter day triumphs of Dr. Serge Kous... ...activities which crowned this year ...nd new highwater marks in reper...

...re remarkably complete and well ...complete lists of works performed through... out fifty years by the orchestra, the soloists, members of the orchestra and conductors, Bliss Perry's memorable address on Colonel Higginson, and a catalogue of the Casadeus collection of ancient instruments.

Phonophiles will note with interest the complete list of the records by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the outside cover and will perhaps wonder why it was not made a permanent part of the book and why there is no reference to the recordings issued several years ago under Dr. Muck's baton.

The original edition of Mr. Howe's book has long been one of the most important histories of a leading American orchestra. The present revision brings it up to date in interesting and informative fashion. RICHARDSON BROWN

Fifty Years of the Boston Orchestra

To commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Houghton-Mifflin has br... out a new edition of M. A. DeWolf Howe's "Th... ...ston Symphony Orchestra," with the new dates ... 1931. The volume has been revised and extended a... contains account of the war years and the latest tr... umphs under Serge Koussevitzky. The able press rep... resentative at Symphony Hall, John Burk, has collaborated on the last chapters and many of the incid... make fascinating reading.

Probably no symphonic organization has had ... dramatic moments than the Boston Symphony Or... tra. The famous incident of the "Star Spangled ... ner," which was twisted out of shape by a pro-Br... editor to throw Dr. Muck into a bad light, his subsequ... removal and arrest for charges never made pu... final relinquishing of the orchestra by Major Higginson, the assumption of the management by a board of trustees, the appearances of Henri Rabaud, and the beginning of the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, with the ensuing strike in the ranks and the final triumph of the French conductor, especially with his epoch-making ... formances of "Le Sacre du Printemps"—all make a ...th that no fiction could equal.

The record goes on to tell of Serge Koussevitzky, the festivals he has added to the large schedule of concerts and the crowning glory of the fiftieth year, when Sir George Henschel was recalled to conduct the first concert of the season as he had fifty years ... when the orchestra had its beginnings.

The appendices contain Bliss Perry's address about Colonel Higginson, the complete repertoire of the orchestra, a list of conductors, soloists and personnel together with a catalogue of the Casadesus collection of old musical instruments.

RICHARDSON BROWN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY publishes the history of its fifty years of activity. It notes the distinguished Europeans who have stood on the conductor's dais since Georg Henschel inaugurated the first season in 1881. It lists an imposing repertoire that, like the vast number of symphonic works performed by our own orchestra, included practically the whole of the literature.

But one is impressed, not so much by the achievements, which are no more than those of any celebrated symphonic ensemble and must, by reason of the limitations of time and place, be less than the historic institutions of Europe can boast, but rather by the spirit that has animated this earliest of American symphonies from its beginning.

* * *

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA was founded and sustained to spread abroad and to foster the love of music; "to make available a vast field of beauty to persons who, having little other enjoyment, have need of this sunshine."

These words of the founder of the Boston orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, have cleared up for me a misunderstanding of the institution. I have thought that the first American orchestra might have had a bit of nationalism in its plan and purpose. But it seems that in Boston music is made for art and humanity in the broadest sense.

* * *

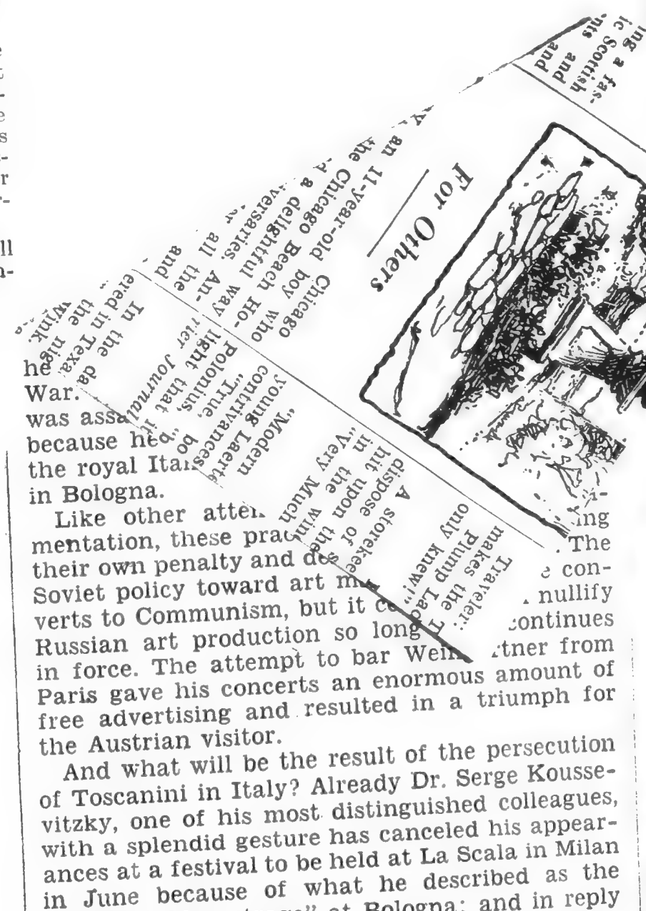
FORTUNATELY the American mu... not excluded from the latter classification, though Maj. Higginson once said that musicians are not like other men and must be treated differently. On that score the American musician cannot complain. He has not been treated like the American manufacturer, or the American workman, either in Boston or elsewhere. No patriotic impulse is stirred in his behalf anywhere in this broad land despite the admitted "grayness" of American life and its need for "vast fields of beauty," which, with a little encouragement, the native musician might provide.

* * *

EVEN in Boston it was found impossible to exclude the American composer entirely, though the American executive, except in the rare capacity of soloist, was rigorously frowned upon. Thus Boston has had nine famous conductors. Five have been German—Henschel, Gericke, Paur, Muck and Fiedler. Two, Rabaud and Monteaux, were French and came after the war. One, the greatest of them all, was Austro-Hungarian, Arthur Nikisch, and the present incumbent is a Russian, Koussevitzky.

But during its fifty years of activity the Boston Symphony has found a place for fifty-eight American composers on its programs. Some, like Chadwick and Foote, had practically their whole output performed. Being native Bostonians, they were not quite as other Americans.

Carpenter, Stock and Sowerby have represented Chicago. Brockway, Schelling, Hanson, Hadley and Hill have represented New York. But I gather that the American elements in the Boston programs have been less numerous under Koussevitzky's reign than heretofore. However, the Boston critics, like no others in the world, are in complete agreement as to Dr. Koussevitzky and his talents, a circumstance that is significant of the power of the man and of the spirit of the city.



...ing ... The ... e con... nullify ...continues ...tner from

...he ... War. ... was ass... because he ... the royal Ita... in Bologna.

Like other atte... mentation, these pra... their own penalty and de... Soviet policy toward art m... verts to Communism, but it c... Russian art production so long ... in force. The attempt to bar Wein... Paris gave his concerts an enormous amount of free advertising and resulted in a triumph for the Austrian visitor.

And what will be the result of the persecution of Toscanini in Italy? Already Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of his most distinguished colleagues, with a splendid gesture has canceled his appearances at a festival to be held at La Scala in Milan in June because of what he described as the "unbelievable outrage" at Bologna; and in reply to the manager's protest that there was insufficient reason for the cancellation, the Boston conductor replied: "It is a question of principle with me and that is sufficient reason. Please cancel my engagement for 1932."

When, in the judgment of the Italian Government, Toscanini has been sufficiently "disciplined," presumably his passport will be returned to him. Then the conductor will journey to Bayreuth to conduct, and next fall will return to fill his engagement in New York. Is it likely that he will be eager again to subject himself to affront and injury by appearing as conductor in his native land?

Thus, it will be observed, the principal results of the Italian "discipline" probably will have been to deprive Italians of the services of two of the foremost conductors of the time, and to strengthen in the rest of the world misgivings concerning a political creed which fosters such interference with art.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 5 1931

(Special Cable to The Herald)
PARIS, May 31—Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's passport, made public today a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala theatre, informing them of his decision not to fulfil his contract. The letter reads:

"Gentlemen: I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"Maestro Toscanini does not belong in Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

M. Koussevitzky said in an interview:

"I have suffered too much from bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascists are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUN 7 - 1931

the music can without the horses.

Gabrilowitsch Won't Direct in Milan

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, has followed the lead of Serge Koussevitsky, Boston conductor, in refusing offers to direct in Milan, it is reported from Berlin by the Associated Press. The refusal is a protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini when he declined to play the Fascist hymn at a Bologna concert. Meantime Toscanini, recovering from injuries suffered in a personal attack, has been conducting concerts of his own, and is free to proceed about his business as he wishes both in Italy and outside.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES STAR
JUN 8 - 1931

Reiner Plays Fascist Music on Demand

Conducts La Scala Opera House Concert in Milan.

INTEREST was aroused among musicians here by a report from Italy that when Fritz Reiner, former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, directed a concert at the famous La Scala Opera House in Milan, he acceded to the demands of the audience and played the patriotic airs demanded. These were the "Marcia Reale" and "Giovanezza."

Refusal of Arturo Toscanini, world famous conductor, to play the Fascist patriotic selections when asked to do so at a recent concert in Italy led to his being attacked and beaten by Fascisti and also caused the Fascist government to delay for some days, issuance to him of a passport to Germany, where he is to conduct the Beyreuth festival.

Toscanini and Reiner long have been friends. Serge Koussevitzki, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitch, Detroit orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, Philadelphia orchestra, were among the many musicians who have voiced protests against Toscanini's treatment.

It was reported from Italy that Reiner's performance of the Fascist selections followed a vigorous demand for the selections from all parts of the opera house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITERARY DIGEST
JUN 13 1931

Toscanini "Disciplined" by Italy's Fascisti

THE TOSCANINI AFFAIR AT BOLOGNA began as a youthful shindy, and bids fair to end as an international controversy.

Mr. Toscanini's expressive back as he stands before an audience easily conveys his reactions to his hearers' behavior.

What he did when assaulted before the opera-house in Bologna is not recorded, but one can imagine no greater shock to one whose weapon to control numbers before and behind him has only been a slender baton.

His spare form, gray hair, and highly intellectual features suggest anything but pugnacity. Yet he rarely fails to get his way.

The great conductor's aversion from the Fascist hymn, "Giovanezza," is not a new thing. He has even before this omitted it in his native country.

But he has never before had his face slapped and been otherwise roughly handled by irresponsible hooligans, for his recalcitrance.

A SECOND affront was said to have followed Mr. Toscanini's return to Milan. A New York Times special cable from Paris states that "friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him and that he was a 'voluntary' prisoner in his house." Credence was added to this by a report that Mr. Mussolini disclaimed responsibility, and declared it a matter between the musician and the prefect of Milan.

Later reports deny that his liberty was taken from him, and say that his seclusion was only a means of protecting him from further annoyance.

Paris papers, so the New York Times prints, have withheld any comment on the affair. Perhaps they recall that recently a determined effort was made to prevent Felix Weingartner from conducting concerts in Paris on the ground that he had been hostile to France during the World War.

No such reticence is displayed by the American press, tho only one or two remember that Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was disciplined here for refusing to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at a concert in Providence, Rhode Island.

But that was during the war itself.

The most conspicuous reaction outside Italy is the refusal of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to fulfil his concert contracts in Milan in June. He is reported to have declared that the treatment of Toscanini was "a disgrace to the Italian Government," and savored of Soviet Russia, from which he had escaped.

Wide World photograph

His Back Up Against the Fascist Hymn

Toscanini portrayed in a character study by the Italian sculptor, Adolfo Wildt.

American papers comment freely, but are not unanimous in the views they take. To some it seems but a conflict of temper and temperament. The Springfield Union holds a balance:

"Toscanini, it is to be feared, is somewhat lacking in this saving grace of humor. However, that does not excuse the vicious assault upon him or his peremptory dismissal from Bologna, altho his stiff-necked attitude is to be considered in distributing the blame for the unfortunate incident. There was bad judgment on both sides."

THE Minneapolis Tribune is more lightsome:

"Toscanini, no doubt, is enjoying some of the delights of martyrdom, which are not inconsiderable in number and quality. The Fascisti who knocked him around are likewise glowing with the warm consciousness of affirmative patriotism. So it can be suspected that a pleasant time was had by all."

Flippant is the Montgomery Advertiser:

"As we understand it, Toscanini claimed that his refusal to play the selection was based, not on political, but on artistic motives, as he thought the hymn was out of keeping with the rest of the program.

"In view of all this much ado about little or nothing, it seems historically fitting that this Italian city should have given its name to a sausage, which in turn is used as a synonym for nonsense in the American vernacular."

THOSE who take strong views on the question of the divorce of politics and the arts see little but tyranny in the treatment of Toscanini. Heywood Broun, as usual, is of no two minds in his World-Telegram column:

"The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist régime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

"No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

"Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini."

"This humorless procedure," says the Philadelphia Record, "would be pathetic if there were not a sinister note in it." More:

governed, as every one knows, by musical rather than political considerations—always he has held himself aloof from political manifestations.

"But to Signor Toscanini freedom of art has always meant as much as freedom of the press means to writers. His concepts to him are veritable rites of art in which nothing incongruous or liable to spoil the atmosphere is permissible. Consequently, he has always been against playing national or political anthems during his concerts.

"To the Fascisti, however, as one of their organs candidly put it recently, 'Toscanini, by refusing to play the Fascist hymn, succeeded in making a name for himself in politics.' Be it remembered that it was because of his refusal to play 'Giovinezza' he had to leave La Scala Opera at Milan and went to New York."

"It seemed that Fascist animosity had died down last year when Signor Toscanini made his triumphal tour of Europe, including Italy, with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Premier Mussolini then sent him a telegram expressing Italy's gratitude at the honor he had brought her. Signor Toscanini replied politely, but perhaps he nettled Premier Mussolini then by failing to make any reference either to the Duce or to his régime.

"Perhaps, as reported, too, whisperers told the Premier that Signor Toscanini, when among his friends, left no doubt that he was against Fascism. At any rate, we are informed that Premier Mussolini made a remark to the effect that Signor Toscanini had gone too far and was taking advantage of his good nature.

"The Duce's slightest word is law, and we had good reason to believe that, rightly or wrongly, his remark was interpreted by the fervent Guido Arpinati, Under-Secretary of the Interior, as an order to make Signor Toscanini pay public homage to Fascism by playing its song or be punished.

"Signor Arpinati is boss at Bologna—he headed Fascismo there bego June 10 to St. Moritz with his wife and daughter, he and his family were under strictest police control at Milan. At all moments they were spied on, letters addressed to them were opened by the censor and the houses of the writers were sometimes searched.

"Despite all this, he was not entirely cut off from his friends and messages of sympathy managed to reach him from both inside and outside Italy, even from some prominent anti-Fascist exiles.

"He was a virtual prisoner in Milan for more than three weeks, the authorities taking his passport and contemplating a refusal to give him a visa to leave Italy despite world opinion and his contracts at Baireuth and New York. He is still, of course, under constant danger of having his property at Milan seized.

"The Fascists made every effort to break Signor Toscanini's spirit. He had been subjected to a long and severely galling nervous strain which was beginning to tell on him physically when he left Milan.

"But Signor Toscanini is not bowed down. His spirit, if anything, is stronger than ever. Of that his friends everywhere may not have all the proofs the Fascists have—but they don't need them, anyway."

then paraded to the Hotel Brun, where for a long time they loudly sang Fascist songs and yelled unprintable insults to the man to whom their Duce so lately had paid homage. They even called for the death of Toscanini.

"During the night Signor Toscanini escaped in his automobile to his home in Via Durini, Milan. News of the outrage roused such indignation in Milan, where the conductor is very popular, as to cause several demonstrations both for him and against fascism.

"On Sunday evening, May 17, students mostly from the Lycee Berchet began a manifestation with cries of 'Viva Toscanini' and 'Ab Basso il Fascismo.' They were soon joined by many passers-by, until police reserves had to be called in to disperse the crowd. Two students were imprisoned.

"From then until he left Italy there were never less than eighteen policemen and five detectives stationed at Signor Toscanini's house, while carabiniers patrolled adjacent streets.

"Yet next night, during the symphony concert at La Scala, another demonstration, with similar cries, broke out for its former conductor, and the audience was quieted with difficulty by the police.

"You can be sure that these manifestations deeply touched Il Maestro, although news of them was suppressed in the press. Fascist papers, instead, praised the aggressors and hurled epithets at the victim. Thus Libri e Moschetti, organ of Fascist students, ended a diatribe against the man described as 'monster, not a genius,' by regretting only that they 'did not spit in his face.'

"The Fascist press also suppressed Serge Koussevitzky's letter to La Scala opera, with his refusal to conduct in Italy until the outrage against Signor Toscanini was effaced, but the knowledge of the Boston conductor's courageous act nevertheless reached Signor Toscanini while he was at Milan and greatly moved him.

"Until he was finally allowed to

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 5 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITERARY DIGEST
JUN 13 1931

Toscanini "Disciplined" by Italy's Fascisti

THE TOSCANINI AFFAIR AT BOLOGNA began as a youthful shindy, and bids fair to end as an international controversy.

Mr. Toscanini's expressive back as he stands before an audience easily conveys his reactions to his hearers' behavior.

What he did when assaulted before the opera-house in Bologna is not recorded, but one can imagine no greater shock to one whose weapon to control numbers before and behind him has only been a slender baton.

His spare form, gray hair, and highly intellectual features suggest anything but pugnacity. Yet he rarely fails to get his way.

The great conductor's aversion from the Fascist hymn, "Giovanezza," is not a new thing. He has even before this omitted it in his native country.

But he has never before had his face slapped and been otherwise roughly handled by irresponsible hooligans, for his recalcitrance.

A SECOND affront was said to have followed Mr. Toscanini's return to Milan. A New York Times special cable from Paris states that "friends of Arturo Toscanini in Paris today were able to telephone him at his home in Milan and obtain confirmation of a report that his passport was taken from him and that he was a 'voluntary' prisoner in his house." Credence was added to this by a report that Mr. Mussolini disclaimed responsibility, and declared it a matter between the musician and the prefect of Milan.

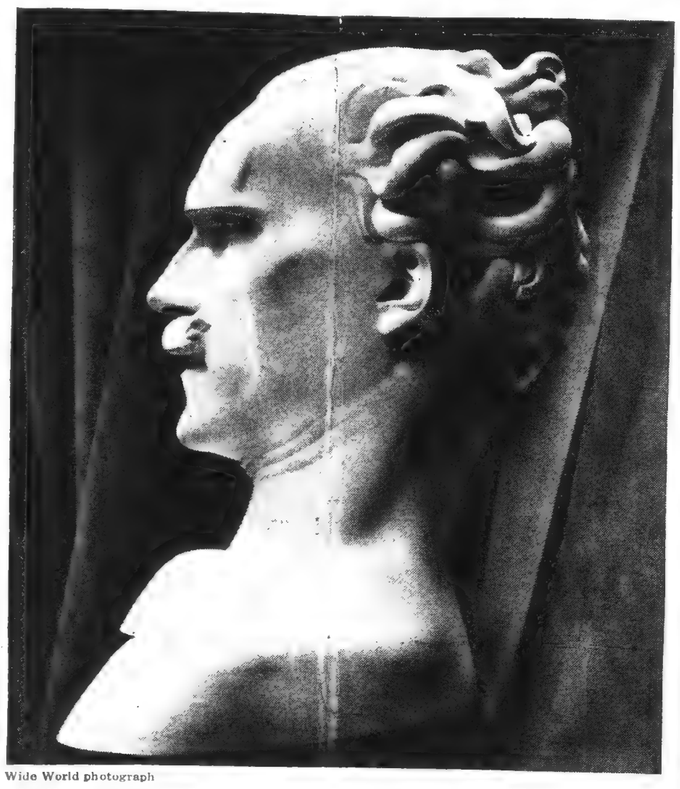
Later reports deny that his liberty was taken from him, and say that his seclusion was only a means of protecting him from further annoyance.

Paris papers, so the New York Times prints, have withheld any comment on the affair. Perhaps they recall that recently a determined effort was made to prevent Felix Weingartner from conducting concerts in Paris on the ground that he had been hostile to France during the World War.

No such reticence is displayed by the American press, tho only one or two remember that Karl Muck, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was disciplined here for refusing to play "The Star-Spangled Banner" at a concert in Providence, Rhode Island.

But that was during the war itself.

The most conspicuous reaction outside Italy is the refusal of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to fulfil his concert contracts in Milan in June. He is reported to have declared that the treatment of Toscanini was "a disgrace to the Italian Government," and savored of Soviet Russia, from which he had escaped.



Wide World photograph

His Back Up Against the Fascist Hymn

Toscanini portrayed in a character study by the Italian sculptor, Adolfo Wildt.

American papers comment freely, but are not unanimous in the views they take. To some it seems but a conflict of temper and temperament. The Springfield Union holds a balance:

"Toscanini, it is to be feared, is somewhat lacking in this saving grace of humor. However, that does not excuse the vicious assault upon him or his peremptory dismissal from Bologna, altho his stiff-necked attitude is to be considered in distributing the blame for the unfortunate incident. There was bad judgment on both sides."

THE Minneapolis Tribune is more lightsome:

"Toscanini, no doubt, is enjoying some of the delights of martyrdom, which are not inconsiderable in number and quality. The Fascisti who knocked him around are likewise glowing with the warm consciousness of affirmative patriotism. So it can be suspected that a pleasant time was had by all."

Flippant is the Montgomery Advertiser:

"As we understand it, Toscanini claimed that his refusal to play the selection was based, not on political, but on artistic motives, as he thought the hymn was out of keeping with the rest of the program.

"In view of all this much ado about little or nothing, it seems historically fitting that this Italian city should have given its name to a sausage, which in turn is used as a synonym for nonsense in the American vernacular."

THOSE who take strong views on the question of the divorce of politics and the arts see little but tyranny in the treatment of Toscanini. Heywood Broun, as usual, is of no two minds in his World-Telegram column:

"The comment goes, as I understand it, that the Fascist régime has scored a great success because the trains of Italy now start and arrive at their destination more closely to schedule. But there is a limit to the Duce's power. He has not as yet been able to make Arturo Toscanini beat time.

"No more petty and contemptible use of tyranny has been known in the modern world than the petty persecution of a great artist. There can be in the minds of musicians no possible question that the conductor was living up to the best of artistic traditions in his refusal to open his concert with the Fascist hymn. But even if Toscanini had been wrong he would still have acted well within his rights. For since when did a dictatorship have the power to question the judgment of a genius?

"Mussolini, I believe, is, among other things, an amateur musician. In the presence of a man of Toscanini's stature Benito is lucky to be able to get in on a pass to stand in the back of the theater. Even if one accepts the most optimistic version of the achievements of Mussolini, not one of them includes anything as glorious as the personality and supreme ability of Toscanini."

"This humorless procedure," says the Philadelphia Record, "would be pathetic if there were not a sinister note in it." More:

governed, as every one knows, by musical rather than political considerations—always he has held himself aloof from political manifestations.

"But to Signor Toscanini freedom of art has always meant as much as freedom of the press means to writers. His concepts to him are veritable rites of art in which nothing incongruous or liable to spoil the atmosphere is permissible. Consequently, he has always been against playing national or political anthems during his concerts.

"To the Fascisti, however, as one of their organs candidly put it recently, 'Toscanini, by refusing to play the Fascist hymn, succeeded in making a name for himself in politics.' Be it remembered that it was because of his refusal to play 'Giovinezza' he had to leave La Scala Opera at Milan and went to New York.'

"It seemed that Fascist animosity had died down last year when Signor Toscanini made his triumphal tour of Europe, including Italy, with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Premier Mussolini then sent him a telegram expressing Italy's gratitude at the honor he had brought her. Signor Toscanini replied politely, but perhaps he nettled Premier Mussolini then by failing to make any reference either to the Duce or to his régime.

"Perhaps, as reported, too, whisperers told the Premier that Signor Toscanini, when among his friends, left no doubt that he was against Fascism. At any rate, we are informed that Premier Mussolini made a remark to the effect that Signor Toscanini had gone too far and was taking advantage of his good nature.

"The Duce's slightest word is law, and we had good reason to believe that, rightly or wrongly, his remark was interpreted by the fervent Guido Arpinati, Under-Secretary of the Interior, as an order to make Signor Toscanini pay public homage to Fascism by playing its song or be punished.

"Signor Arpinati is boss at Bologna—he headed Fascismo there be-

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUN 7 - 1931

the music can without the libretto.

Gabrilowitsch Won't Direct in Milan

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, has followed the lead of Serge Koussevitzky, Boston conductor, in refusing offers to direct in Milan, it is reported from Berlin by the Associated Press. The refusal is a protest against the treatment accorded Arturo Toscanini when he declined to play the Fascist hymn at a Bologna concert. Meantime Toscanini, recovering from injuries suffered in a personal attack, has been conducting concerts of his own, and is free to proceed about his business as he wishes both in Italy and outside.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES STAR
JUN 8 - 1931

Reiner Plays Fascist Music on Demand

Conducts La Scala Opera House Concert in Milan.

INTEREST was aroused among musicians here by a report from Italy that when Fritz Reiner, former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, directed a concert at the famous La Scala Opera House in Milan, he acceded to the demands of the audience and played the patriotic airs demanded. These were the "Marcia Reale" and "Giovanezza."

Refusal of Arturo Toscanini, world famous conductor, to play the Fascist patriotic selections when asked to do so at a recent concert in Italy led to his being attacked and beaten by Fascisti and also caused the Fascist government to delay for some days, issuance to him of a passport to Germany, where he is to conduct the Beyreuth festival.

Toscanini and Reiner long have been friends. Serge Koussevitzki, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitch, Detroit orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, Philadelphia orchestra, were among the many musicians who have voiced protests against Toscanini's treatment.

It was reported from Italy that Reiner's performance of the Fascist selections followed a vigorous demand for the selections from all parts of the opera house.

(Special Cable to The Herald)

PARIS, May 31—Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's passport, made public today a letter which he wrote to the directors of the Scala theatre, informing them of his decision not to fulfil his contract. The letter reads:

"Gentlemen: I have learned from newspapers of the unprecedented outrage which has been perpetrated against an artist in your country. I am so shocked and deeply hurt that I am writing to ask you to liberate me from the engagement which I accepted for the month of June.

"Maestro Toscanini does not belong in Italy, but to the whole world, as does every great artist. We artists of other nationalities cannot remain indifferent to the fate of a colleague who is exposed to blows and persecution because of his refusal to mix politics with art."

M. Koussevitzky said in an interview:

"I have suffered too much from bolsheviki to tolerate what the Fascists are doing to artists. Both these regimes have wrought terrible crimes against culture and the respect which is owing to thought and to art."

go June 10 to St. Moritz with his wife and daughter, he and his family were under strictest police control at Milan. At all moments they were spied on, letters addressed to them were opened by the censor and the houses of the writers were sometimes searched.

"Despite all this, he was not entirely cut off from his friends and messages of sympathy managed to reach him from both inside and outside Italy, even from some prominent anti-Fascist exiles.

"He was a virtual prisoner in Milan for more than three weeks, the authorities taking his passport and contemplating a refusal to give him a visa to leave Italy despite world opinion and his contracts at Baireuth and New York. He is still, of course, under constant danger of having his property at Milan seized.

"The Fascists made every effort to break Signor Toscanini's spirit. He had been subjected to a long and severely galling nervous strain which was beginning to tell on him physically when he left Milan.

"But Signor Toscanini is not bowed down. His spirit, if anything, is stronger than ever. Of that his friends everywhere may not have all the proofs the Fascists have—but they don't need them, anyway."

then paraded to the Hotel Brun, where for a long time they loudly sang Fascist songs and yelled unprintable insults to the man to whom their Duce so lately had paid homage. They even called for the death of Toscanini.

"During the night Signor Toscanini escaped in his automobile to his home in Via Durini, Milan. News of the outrage roused such indignation in Milan, where the conductor is very popular, as to cause several demonstrations both for him and against fascism.

"On Sunday evening, May 17, students mostly from the Lycee Berchet began a manifestation with cries of 'Viva Toscanini' and 'Ab Basso il Fascismo.' They were soon joined by many passers-by, until police reserves had to be called in to disperse the crowd. Two students were imprisoned.

"From then until he left Italy there were never less than eighteen policemen and five detectives stationed at Signor Toscanini's house, while carabiniers patrolled adjacent streets.

"Yet next night, during the symphony concert at La Scala, another demonstration, with similar cries, broke out for its former conductor, and the audience was quieted with difficulty by the police.

"You can be sure that these manifestations deeply touched Il Maestro, although news of them was suppressed in the press. Fascist papers, instead, praised the aggressors and hurled epithets at the victim. Thus Libri e Moschetti, organ of Fascist students, ended a diatribe against the man described as 'monster, not a genius,' by regretting only that they 'did not spit in his face.'

"The Fascist press also suppressed Serge Koussevitzky's letter to La Scala opera, with his refusal to conduct in Italy until the outrage against Signor Toscanini was effaced, but the knowledge of the Boston conductor's courageous act nevertheless reached Signor Toscanini while he was at Milan and greatly moved him.

"Until he was finally allowed to

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JUN 5 1931

(Special Cable to The Herald)
PARIS, May 31—Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who refused to conduct a series of concerts in Milan after he learned of the Fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini and the seizure of the latter's passport, made public toda; a letter which he wrote to the direc tors of the Scala theatre, informin them of his decision not to fulfil hi contract. The letter reads:

"Gentlemen: I have learned fro newspapers of the unprecedente outrage which has been perpetrat against an artist in your country, am so shocked and deeply hurt th I am writing to ask you to libera me from the engagement which I a cepted for the month of June.

"Maestro Toscanini does not l long in Italy, but to the whole wo as does every great artist. We tists of other nationalities can remain indifferent to the fate of colleague who is exposed to bla and persecution because of his fusal to mix politics with art."

M. Koussevitzky said in an int view:

"I have suffered too much fr bolsheviki to tolerate what the F cists are doing to artists. Both th regimes have wrought terrible crim against culture and the resp which is owing to thought and art."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL
CHRONICLE
JUN 7 - 1931

the music can without the hor

Gabrilowitsch Won Direct in Mil

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conducto the Detroit Symphony Orches has followed the lead of Serge K sevitzky, Boston conductor, in fusing offers to direct in Milan is reported from Berlin by the sociated Press. The refusal i protest against the treatment corded Arturo Toscanini when declined to play the Fascist hym a Bologna concert. Meantime T canini, recovering from injuries fered in a personal attack, has b conducting concerts of his own, is free to proceed about his busi as he wishes both in Italy and side.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES STAR
JUN 8 - 1931

Reiner Plays Fascist Music on Demand

Conducts La Scala Opera House Concert in Milan.

INTEREST was aroused among musicians here by a report from Italy that when Fritz Reiner, former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, directed a concert at the famous La Scala Opera House in Milan, he acceded to the demands of the audience and played the patriotic airs demanded. These were the "Marcia Reale" and "Giovanezza."

Refusal of Arturo Toscanini, world famous conductor, to play the Fascist patriotic selections when asked to do so at a recent concert in Italy led to his being attacked and beaten by Fascisti and also caused the Fascist government to delay for some days, issuance to him of a passport to Germany, where he is to conduct the Beyreuth festival.

Toscanini and Reiner long have been friends. Serge Koussevitzki, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ossip Gabrilowitch, Detroit orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, Philadelphia orchestra, were among the many musicians who have voiced protests against Toscanini's treatment.

It was reported from Italy that Reiner's performance of the Fascist selections followed a vigorous demand for the selections from all parts of the opera house.

"In Italy, apparently, as in Russia, Germany, and now Spain, the amenities of life have been sacrificed to an egregious and constant display of the militant, nationalist spirit.

"A whole new lexicon of fighting words has been evolved. Under the driving urge to remake the nation into something like old Sparta, graciousness and the smile seem to have vanished.

"This kind of moral righteousness, which regards the non-playing of an anthem as a mortal offense, is what makes wars, causes lynchings, and creates a lot more of human troubles.

"It is a pity that so many world movements have as their mainstay men who can't see beyond the symbol, and who, in their inhuman concentration on the symbol, commit offenses against everything that is good in daily life."

THE Baltimore Sun has only pity for Italy:

"For in Italy they suffer chronically from the war fever, even in peace time.

"Every morning, no matter how placid the international scene, good Fascists must arise and go about the day with taut nerves and suspicious glances, seeking ever a slur on the national honor.

"It must be exhausting. This Mussolini doubtless has his good points; but the way he keeps his subjects keyed up is downright inhuman."

According to Prince Pignatilli, Il Duce told Universal Service:

"We shall not give excessive importance to a banal incident. There has been no official communication and we have no intention of making one.

"The affair is being handled by the Prefect of Milan, who must arrive at his own solution."

Japan Becc
Altho "Cyrano" seren

The Cover

TO Mr. Ferris's historical series comes another dealing with the romantic side of Washington.

Romance was not, however, a dominating element in Washington's nature, as will be seen from the note Mr. Ferris has prepared to accompany his picture, adapted, he explains, from the Custis "Memoirs":

"In 1758, Colonel Washington, while crossing the ferry, called William's, over the Pamunkey, a branch of the York River, met one of those personages who give an idea of the Virginia gentleman of the old régime, the soul of kindness and hospitality.

"Washington urged that his business at Williamsburg was pressing, but the gentleman, whose name was Chamberlayne, would hear of no excuse for not accepting his hospitality; Washington was a name and character so well known to all Virginians that continuing his journey was entirely out of the question. Chamberlayne intimated that he would introduce his friend to a young and charming widow then beneath his roof, and Washington capitulated.

"He was introduced to various guests, and above all to the charming widow. They were of an age when impressions are strongest.

"The lady was fair to see, of fascinating manners, and splendidly endowed with worldly goods; the hero, fresh from early fields, was redolent of fame, and of imposing and attractive person.

"The sun rode high in the heavens the ensuing day when the enamored soldier took horse and sped his way to the seat of government, where having dispatched his public business he retraced his steps, and at 'White House,' Martha Custis's estate, the engagement took place, with preparations for the marriage.

"Tradition says that when he came to her residence he was ferried over the river by a slave, who, when asked 'Was his mistress at home,' replied 'Yassah, I reckon you's de man what's expected.'

"The lovers did not meet again until their marriage on the following 17th of January, 1759."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
JUN 15 1931

Toscanini in Retreat, Fascist Attack on H

Wireless to THE

ST. MORITZ, Switzerland, June 14.—High above this village, in its most isolated villa, Arturo Toscanini is resting in strictest privacy. He wants only quiet now, and nothing could be quieter than this fashionable resort before the season opens.

When he arrived here from Milan June 10 with his wife and daughter, Countess di Castelbarco-Toscanini, there was a worn and harassed expression on his face that shocked those who knew him, and although they realized what he had been through in Italy, in a controversy with Fascists, it surprised them. He is losing that look now as he strolls along the soft flower-lined paths and lounges in sunny mountain meadows, contemplating the snow-capped Alps.

That is how he spends his days. No one follows him, no one bothers him here—all respect his wishes.

Those few who do come to his door are told politely but convincingly that he and his family will receive no one while here, and he wants neither to talk nor to think at present of his experiences in Italy after the controversy in Bologna, where he refused to play Fascist airs at a concert and thereby precipitated a riot. The authorities took up his passport but returned it later.

Wears Haggard Look; im Called an Ambush

NEW YORK TIMES.

He would like his friends to say as little as possible about the matter now. His one idea here is to rest and get back into the frame of mind which his respect for his art requires of him at his coming concerts in Baireuth, where he plans to go June 20.

"Something goes on until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning," said the noted conductor's nearest neighbor. "Lights are turned on in the villa. A piano answers softly to the master's hand. Then the music stops and the lights go out. These musicians have their own way of resting."

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LUGANO, June 14.—The Fascist assault on Arturo Toscanini at Bologna was not a spontaneous outbreak but an ambush, according to an uncensored account obtained from a friend of the great conductor. This version, based on close personal knowledge of the case, follows:

"To see the Bologna attack in its true perspective one must know that Signor Toscanini's courageous independence long has made him a thorn in the side of Fascism.

"It does not matter to the Fascisti that Signor Toscanini's attitudes are governed, as every one knows, by musical rather than political considerations—always he has held himself aloof from political manifestations.

"But to Signor Toscanini freedom of art has always meant as much as freedom of the press means to writers. His concepts to him are veritable rites of art in which nothing incongruous or liable to spoil the atmosphere is permissible. Consequently, he has always been against playing national or political anthems during his concerts.

"To the Fascisti, however, as one of their organs candidly put it recently, 'Toscanini, by refusing to play the Fascist hymn, succeeded in making a name for himself in politics.' Be it remembered that it was because of his refusal to play 'Giovinezza' he had to leave La Scala Opera at Milan and went to New York.'

"It seemed that Fascist animosity had died down last year when Signor Toscanini made his triumphal tour of Europe, including Italy, with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Premier Mussolini then sent him a telegram expressing Italy's gratitude at the honor he had brought her. Signor Toscanini replied politely, but perhaps he nettled Premier Mussolini then by failing to make any reference either to the Duce or to his régime.

"Perhaps, as reported, too, whisperers told the Premier that Signor Toscanini, when among his friends, left no doubt that he was against Fascism. At any rate, we are informed that Premier Mussolini made a remark to the effect that Signor Toscanini had gone too far and was taking advantage of his good nature.

"The Duce's slightest word is law, and we had good reason to believe that, rightly or wrongly, his remark was interpreted by the fervent Guido Arpinati, Under-Secretary of the Interior, as an order to make Signor Toscanini pay public homage to Fascism by playing its song or be punished.

"Signor Arpinati is boss at Bologna—he headed Fascismo there bego June 10 to St. Moritz with his wife and daughter, he and his family were under strictest police control at Milan. At all moments they were spied on, letters addressed to them were opened by the censor and the houses of the writers were sometimes searched.

"Despite all this, he was not entirely cut off from his friends and messages of sympathy managed to reach him from both inside and outside Italy, even from some prominent anti-Fascist exiles.

"He was a virtual prisoner in Milan for more than three weeks, the authorities taking his passport and contemplating a refusal to give him a visa to leave Italy despite world opinion and his contracts at Baireuth and New York. He is still, of course, under constant danger of having his property at Milan seized.

"The Fascists made every effort to break Signor Toscanini's spirit. He had been subjected to a long and severely galling nervous strain which was beginning to tell on him physically when he left Milan.

"But Signor Toscanini is not bowed down. His spirit, if anything, is stronger than ever. Of that his friends everywhere may not have all the proofs the Fascists have—but they don't need them, anyway."

fore he became its Governor. Into his bailiwck he sought to bring the illustrious offender to bear in such a way as to make it hard for him to refuse to play 'Giovinezza.'

"The first plan was to invite Signor Toscanini to open the season at the municipal theatre, which had just been restored, the idea being that once Signor Toscanini arrived it would be impressed on him that since the theatre had been restored under Fascism it would be necessary to open it with 'Giovinezza.'

"Signor Liparini, who is Podesta at Bologna [Mayor], went to Salsomaggiore, where Signor Toscanini was taking the cure, to invite him as 'th greatest orchestra conductor' to give the special solemnity which Bologna desired for this ceremony. Signor Toscanini declined, excusing himself as being ill.

"Then it was decided to organize at Bologna two big concerts in memory of Signor Toscanini's friend, the late composer, Joseph Martucci, whose music alone should be played in them. Seeing no possibility of politics in this invitation, Signor Toscanini was delighted at the honor to Signor Martucci and agreed to conduct both concerts free.

"Without saying anything to him, his hosts arranged to hold at Bologna, on the same days as the concerts, a Fascist ceremony and festival, which would be officially attended by persons as close to the Duce as the father-in-law of his daughter, Count Costanzo Ciano, who is Postmaster General, and also Signor Aprinaiti. Naturally, being in Bologna on the same day, they would have to attend the Toscanini concert, and naturally the presence of such high officials would confront Signor Toscanini with a strong demand to play the official anthems.

"Signor Toscanini, not suspecting a trap, found himself forced by personal reasons to postpone the concerts for May 14. Thereupon the Bologna Fascist ceremonies were likewise postponed.

"Still not suspecting, Signor Toscanini arrived at Bologna. It was only a few hours before the concert that he learned Count Ciano and Signor Arpiniti were going to attend. A delegation from the Mayor informed him of that and added that they would be delayed by a banquet until 9:30 P. M.

"Consequently, Signor Toscanini—known for his insistence on concerts beginning punctually—was told that the concert must be delayed for half an hour. He answered that he did not object if the public were warned.

"Then the delegation told him he must play the royal hymn and the Fascist anthem in view of the official guests. Signor Toscanini flatly refused. He told them they knew his principles and that politics had no place in a concert commemorating a musician.

"They asked him more politely, they asked him more roughly, but he was adamant. Stratagems and threats had failed; punishment remained.

"Fascist hoodlums under a certain Regazzi, notorious in Bologna for much more violent jobs, were then posted outside the theatre. Inside, several were stationed in the conductor's box as a precaution against Signor Toscanini slipping in. Orders were executed at the right time to close the exits of the theatre so as to diminish the chance of rescue from the crowd.

"Into this Signor Toscanini, though aware he was one against an ugly multitude, rode up in his car. He got out at the door of the theatre. Squads of Fascisti surged threateningly around. Young bucks armed with heavy canes roughly ordered the playing of 'Giovinezza' from the man with gray but leonine hair.

"And the lone man, whose only arms were a slender baton, refused. They fell upon him. Signor Toscanini, despite his age, defended himself well, but could not avoid all their blows. With the help of his chauffeur he got away in his car and back to the Hotel Brun, where he was staying. Why so few police were at the theatre, why these did nothing, perhaps the Podesta can explain.

"Under Mario Ghinelli, secretary of the Bologna Fascismo, the Fascisti then paraded to the Hotel Brun, where for a long time they loudly sang Fascist songs and yelled unprintable insults to the man to whom their Duce so lately had paid homage. They even called for the death of Toscanini.

"During the night Signor Toscanini escaped in his automobile to his home in Via Durini, Milan. News of the outrage roused such indignation in Milan, where the conductor is very popular, as to cause several demonstrations both for him and against fascism.

"On Sunday evening, May 17, students mostly from the Lycee Berchet began a manifestation with cries of 'Viva Toscanini' and 'Ab Basso il Fascismo.' They were soon joined by many passers-by, until police reserves had to be called in to disperse the crowd. Two students were imprisoned.

"From then until he left Italy there were never less than eighteen policemen and five detectives stationed at Signor Toscanini's house, while carabiniers patrolled adjacent streets.

"Yet next night, during the symphony concert at La Scala, another demonstration, with similar cries, broke out for its former conductor, and the audience was quieted with difficulty by the police.

"You can be sure that these manifestations deeply touched Il Maestro, although news of them was suppressed in the press. Fascist papers, instead, praised the aggressors and hurled epithets at the victim. Thus Libri e Moschetti, organ of Fascist students, ended a diatribe against the man described as 'monster, not a genius,' by regretting only that they 'did not spit in his face.'

"The Fascist press also suppressed Serge Koussevitzky's letter to La Scala [illegible] with his refusal to conduct in Italy until the outrage against Signor Toscanini was effaced, but the knowledge of the Boston conductor's courageous act nevertheless reached Signor Toscanini while he was at Milan and greatly moved him.

"Until he was finally allowed to 218

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

JUN 7 - 1931

Boston Symphony Recordings Attract Wide Attention.

Moussorgsky - Ravel Numbers Released by RCA-Victor Company.

THE almost stupendous success of Maurice Ravel's sensational "Bolero," which was played by practically every important American orchestra last season, has brought the attention of modern music-fanciers to bear on the recording of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," as played by the Boston Symphony orchestra and released throughout the country by the RCA-Victor company. This release comprises seven record sides and is the Victor musical masterpiece album set M 102. Coupled with the last part of the Moussorgsky opus is the sarabande from Debussy's suite "Pour le Piano," orchestrated by Ravel.

In no respect a work basking merely in the reflected glory of the "Bolero," this is in some respects the finest Ravel opus to be recorded. "Pictures at an Exhibition" was originally composed in 1874 as a connected series of piano solos. It was the great Russian's tonal tribute to his close friend, Victor Hartmann, a young architect. Hartmann, at the outset of a career which might have brought him to the top of his profession, had died the preceding year. Some of his water colors were placed on exhibition in St. Petersburg by Hartmann's friend, Stassov. Moussorgsky then conceived the idea of transmitting his impressions of the exhibition into sound. This project he carried out, without, however, creating more than an imperfect piano score.

Structurally the work is unique. Commencing with a simple promenade, the score brings the auditor-viewer before the first picture, the content and spirit of which is expressed by a marvelous tone picture. The promenade resumes, and the second picture is viewed—with the ears, of course. And so on through the entire gamut of ten paintings. The record is easily the finest the Boston orchestra has made, and is doubly valuable in that M. Koussevitzky, for whom the new version was made, is wielding the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUN 7 - 1931

Boomgramme.

Boston Orchestra Retains Personnel

At a time when musicians the world over are troubled with the uncertainty of their profession, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented comforting news to its hundred players. Serge Koussevitzky is convinced that the entire personnel is competent, and has announced that he will make no changes in the orchestra for next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER

JUN 1 1 1931

New Works at Boston Symphony

To the Boston Symphony Orchestra goes the palm for having presented more novelties than any other orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky planned to make the 50th anniversary of the orchestra's existence a gala year, and he commissioned some of the best known composers to write works for this season. Foremost among these was Igor Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus. This work made a profound impression on many musicians, especially when they could forget that its composer had also written the "Sacre du Printemps" and "Les Noces." Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra was also played, although it did not have its first performance on this occasion. Albert Roussel came to this country to hear his G minor Symphony, a beautiful work specially composed for the 50th anniversary. Arthur Honegger's Symphony was also one of the commissioned works. Edward Burlingame Hill's 2nd Symphony and Nabokov's symphony were both heard for the first time in New York.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JUN 1 4 1931

An Outstanding Orchestra

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1881-1931. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. Semicentennial Edition, revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk . . . Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company . . . $2.50.

Reviewed by
PETER BOWDOIN

IN APPRAISING a book it is unusual to begin with the appendices, but here the temptation happens to be irresistible. Several of the appendices to "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," constitute, if accurate, an exceedingly valuable contribution to musical annals. Appendix B professes to include all the orchestral compositions played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its inaugural concert in 1881 through May 2, 1931; to supply the full date of the initial performance and the years of subsequent performances, and further to indicate the number of times each work has been given and to identify "first times" anywhere or in the United States. Appendix C furnishes dates of the terms of service of the nine conductors who in fifty years have directed the orchestra and of all of its members, plus the make-up of the orchestra in the first season of each conductor in turn. Appendix D lists the names of all soloists and assisting musicians who have taken part in the concerts through April, 1931, whether in Boston or elsewhere, together with the years and number of their appearances. The information thus offered in convenient form would be of inestimable usefulness if one could rely on its accuracy. When, however, one finds Nellie Melba named as a soloist in 1890, one inevitably falls a prey to doubt, inasmuch as the eminent soprano never visited America until the autumn of 1893. Perhaps hurried proof-reading for these up-to-the-minute statistics is the true explanation.

The body of the book is devoted to an account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its founding single-handed by the late Major Henry Lee Higginson on through all its subsequent vicissitudes, which at one time threatened its existence. Major Higginson once gave the following story of the origin of the orchestra: "During some years of my youth, spent in Germany and especially in Austria, whither I went to study music, I conceived the hope to see an orchestra in Boston which should play as well as the great orchestras of Europe and give concerts at a reasonable price ..... The end of the Civil War left me without an occupation or money, and with a wife who it was my first so for many years ic lay asleep. At last, ears ending in 1880, my way, and enabled his project in earnest Thus the Boston estra became Major nt, his racing stable, his art gallery." Not he Major, then in his year, relinquish the nd supervision of the committee of Boston- y Judge Frederick P. as continued to guide account is largely an tors. The first was that rsatile musician, Georg Sir George Henschel), who returned last autumn at the age of eighty to repeat his inaugural program (save for one number) as part of the festivities of the orchestra's semi-centennial year. In 1884 Wilhelm Gericke of the Vienna Court Opera succeeded Henschel, who had not proved himself an ideal band-builder. Gericke was astonished at the amount of orchestral music that Boston already had heard during the three seasons of its orchestra, preceded by seventeen years of concerts given by the Harvard Musical Association: "I am completely dumbfounded! I do not see what is left for me to do here. You seem to have heard everything already; more, much more, than we ever heard in Vienna!" However, there distinctly was something for him to do there—the construction of a real orchestra out of a "chance aggregation of heterogeneous elements," to quote a distinguished European violinist. "In rendering the orchestra both homogeneous and expert, Mr. Gericke fully earned the encomiums often bestowed upon him by Mr. Higginson and by others less directly interested: 'Gericke made our orchestra.'" Higginson himself wrote: "There was no limit to his patience, and no limit to the pains which he took; and he taught those first violins to sing as violins sing in Vienna alone."

When the Hungarian Arthur Nikisch came from the Leipzig Stadt Theatre to replace Gericke in 1889 he found a perfect instrument at his disposal. "All I have to do is to poetize!" His was the romantic period of the orchestra, the beginning of a "conductor cult" in Boston. After him Emil Paur held somewhat rude sway from 1893 to 1898. Whereupon Gericke returned to be the leader of perfections until the spring of 1906. The following autumn Dr. Karl Muck was engaged and remained in charge (except for four less notable years under Max Fiedler, 1908-1912) until his arrest and internment during the World War in 1918. That painful episode, Mr. Howe points out, has never been satisfactorily explained, and for a time it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra must go out of existence. In any case, what may be called its German period was over. Two French conductors, however, Henri Rabaud (1918-1919) and Pierre Monteux (1919-1924) saw it through the trials of reconstruction, and in 1924 the somewhat sensational Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, took up the baton and restored the prestige and popularity of the orchestra both at home and in other cities.

Indeed, Mr. Howe closes his engrossing story of one of the determining factors in the musical life of America with this fine tribute to the present batonist: "The conductor's inexhaustible energies, distributed wisely but to the last ounce, have fused the many musicians into a single voice, which is the abounding life and interest of the Boston Symphony concerts at present. One need look no further to account for an enlarged public and its keener enjoyments, for the increasing apprehension of music is an indispensable part of our daily lives."

218

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

JUN 7 - 1931

Boston Symphony Recordings Attract Wide Attention.

Moussorgsky - Ravel Numbers Released by RCA-Victor Company.

THE almost stupendous success of Maurice Ravel's sensational "Bolero," which was played by practically every important American orchestra last season, has brought the attention of modern music fanciers to bear on the recording of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," as played by the Boston Symphony orchestra and released throughout the country by the RCA-Victor company. This release comprises seven record sides and is the Victor musical masterpiece album set M 102. Coupled with the last part of the Moussorgsky opus is the sarabande from Debussy's suite "Pour le Piano," orchestrated by Ravel.

In no respect a work basking merely in the reflected glory of the "Bolero," this is in some respects the finest Ravel opus to be recorded. "Pictures at an Exhibition" was originally composed in 1874 as a connected series of piano solos. It was the great Russian's tonal tribute to his close friend, Victor Hartmann, a young architect. Hartmann, at the outset of a career which might have brought him to the top of his profession, had died the preceding year. Some of his water colors were placed on exhibition in St. Petersburg by Hartmann's friend, Stassov. Moussorgsky then conceived the idea of transmitting his impressions of the exhibition into sound. This project he carried out, without, however, creating more than an imperfect piano score.

Structurally the work is unique. Commencing with a simple promenade, the score brings the auditor-viewer before the first picture, the content and spirit of which is expressed by a marvelous tone picture. The promenade resumes, and the second picture is viewed—with the ears, of course. And so on through the entire gamut of ten paintings. The record is easily the finest the Boston orchestra has made, and is doubly valuable in that M. Koussevitzky, for whom the new version was made, is wielding the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUN 7 1931

Boomersnine.

Boston Orchestra Retains Personnel

At a time when musicians the world over are troubled with the uncertainty of their profession, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has presented comforting news to its hundred players. Serge Koussevitzky is convinced that the entire personnel is competent, and has announced that he will make no changes in the orchestra for next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL LEADER

JUN 11 193

New W

To the B for having orchestra. 50th annivers and he com posers to wri these was Ig for orchestra found impress they could fo the "Sacre du sky's "Capric played, althou on this occasic to hear his G cially compose Honegger's Sy sioned works. phony and Nat the first time i that a tendency may himself, all too ofte current, little heeding "The trouble with isn't any—at least the of the new composer exceptions) seem to as a whole in these t that what our audien aria by a steam siren mer. The days whe work with delight hi people stand in line fat women, tattooed charmers and the wi of a musical curiosi "Do the greater n like this? They do cians of the time, and again that they ballyhoo of the sid the public all the ti Ambassador Dawes

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JUN 14 1931

An Outstanding Orchestra

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1881-1931. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. Semicentennial Edition, revised and extended in collaboration with John N. Burk . . . Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company . . . $2.50.

Reviewed by
PETER BOWDOIN

IN APPRAISING a book it is unusual to begin with the appendices, but here the temptation happens to be irresistible. Several of the appendices to "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1881-1931," constitute, if accurate, an exceedingly valuable contribution to musical annals. Appendix B professes to include all the orchestral compositions played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its inaugural concert in 1881 through May 2, 1931; to supply the full date of the initial performance and the years of subsequent performances, and further to indicate the number of times each work has been given and to identify "first times" anywhere or in the United States. Appendix C furnishes dates of the terms of service of the nine conductors who in fifty years have directed the orchestra and of all of its members, plus the make-up of the orchestra in the first season of each conductor in turn. Appendix D lists the names of all soloists and assisting musicians who have taken part in the concerts through April, 1931, whether in Boston or elsewhere, together with the years and number of their appearances. The information thus offered in convenient form would be of inestimable usefulness if one could rely on its accuracy. When, however, one finds Nellie Melba named as a soloist in 1890, one inevitably falls a prey to doubt, inasmuch as the eminent soprano never visited America until the autumn of 1893. Perhaps hurried proof-reading for these up-to-the-minute statistics is the true explanation.

The body of the book is devoted to an account of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its founding single-handed by the late Major Henry Lee Higginson on through all its subsequent vicissitudes, which at one time threatened its existence. Major Higginson once gave the following story of the origin of the orchestra: "During some years of my youth, spent in Germany and especially in Austria, whither I went to study music, I conceived the hope to see an orchestra in Boston which should play as well as the great orchestras of Europe and give concerts at a reasonable price ..... The end of the Civil War left me without an occupation or money, and with a wife who it was my first duty to support; so for many years my hope for music lay asleep. At last, in one or two years ending in 1880, luck had turned my way, and enabled me to take up this project in earnest early in 1881." Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra became Major Higginson's "yacht, his racing stable, his library, and his art gallery." Not until 1918 did the Major, then in his eighty-fourth year, relinquish the maintenance and supervision of the orchestra to a committee of Bostonians, headed by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, which has continued to guide its destinies.

Mr. Howell's account is largely an epic of conductors. The first was that gifted and versatile musician, Georg Henschel (now Sir George Henschel), who returned last autumn at the age of eighty to repeat his inaugural program (save for one number) as part of the festivities of the orchestra's semi-centennial year. In 1884 Wilhelm Gericke of the Vienna Court Opera succeeded Henschel, who had not proved himself an ideal band-builder. Gericke was astonished at the amount of orchestral music that Boston already had heard during the three seasons of its orchestra, preceded by seventeen years of concerts given by the Harvard Musical Association: "I am completely dumbfounded! I do not see what is left for me to do here. You seem to have heard everything already; more, much more, than we ever heard in Vienna!" However, there distinctly was something for him to do there—the construction of a real orchestra out of a "chance aggregation of heterogeneous elements," to quote a distinguished European violinist. "In rendering the orchestra both homogeneous and expert, Mr. Gericke fully earned the encomiums often bestowed upon him by Mr. Higginson and by others less directly interested: 'Gericke made our orchestra.'" Higginson himself wrote: "There was no limit to his patience, and no limit to the pains which he took; and he taught those first violins to sing as violins sing in Vienna alone."

When the Hungarian Arthur Nikisch came from the Leipzig Stadt Theatre to replace Gericke in 1889 he found a perfect instrument at his disposal. "All I have to do is to poetize!" His was the romantic period of the orchestra, the beginning of a "conductor cult" in Boston. After him Emil Paur held somewhat rude sway from 1893 to 1898. Whereupon Gericke returned to be the leader of perfections until the spring of 1906. The following autumn Dr. Karl Muck was engaged and remained in charge (except for four less notable years under Max Fiedler, 1908-1912) until his arrest and internment during the World War in 1918. That painful episode, Mr. Howe points out, has never been satisfactorily explained, and for a time it looked as though the Boston Symphony Orchestra must go out of existence. In any case, what may be called its German period was over. Two French conductors, however, Henri Rabaud (1918-1919) and Pierre Monteux (1919-1924) saw it through the trials of reconstruction, and in 1924 the somewhat sensational Russian, Serge Koussevitzky, took up the baton and restored the prestige and popularity of the orchestra both at home and in other cities.

Indeed, Mr. Howe closes his engrossing story of one of the determining factors in the musical life of America with this fine tribute to the present batonist: "The conductor's inexhaustible energies, distributed wisely but to the last ounce, have fused the many musicians into a single voice, which is the abounding life and interest of the Boston Symphony concerts at present. One need look no further to account for an enlarged public and its keener enjoyments, for the increasing apprehension of music is an indispensable part of our daily lives."

* * *

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pops. Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Evenings at 8:30. Opening Night, Wednesday, May 6—Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Minuet (for String Orchestra), Bolzoni; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Tales from Johann Strauss, Kornzold; "Londonderry Air," arranged by Harty; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2, Liszt; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; Czardas from the Opera "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Thursday, May 7—Marche Militaire, Schubert; Overture, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Two Pieces in Canon Form, Schumann-Dubois; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "El Amor Brujo," Ballet Suite, De Falla; Scherzo (Pizzicato) from the Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; Bolero, Ravel; waltz from "The Bat," Strauss; "To a Water Lily," MacDowell; "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner.

Friday, May 8—"Procession of Bacchus," Delibes; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Rosemunde," ballet music, Schubert; "Cavalleria Rusticana," Intermezzo, Mascagni; "Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "New Moon," selection, Romberg; "Waves of the Danube," waltz, Ivanovici; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Saturday, May 9—March, "Schechenyi Induio," Fahrbach; "William Tell," overture, Rossini; Minuet from the "Clock" symphony, Haydn; "Aida," Fantasia, Verdi; "The Sorceror's Apprentice," Scherzo, Dukas; "Largo," Handel; "Ballet of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Nina Rosa," selection, Romberg; "Music of the Spheres," waltz, Josef Strauss; "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

Sunday, May 10—March, "Pomp and Circumstance," No. 5, Elgar; Fifth Symphony, Boyce; Londonderry Air, Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert; "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia, Tchaikovsky; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Overture Solonnelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

JORDAN HALL, Thursday at 8:15. Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph F. Wagner, conductor — "Scotch" Symphony, Mendelssohn; "The Lark Ascending," for violin and orchestra, Vaughan Williams; "Scarecrow Sketches," F. S. Converse; Havanaise, opus 83, for violin, Saint-Saens; Caucasian Sketches," Ippolitov-Ivanov, Soloist, Einar Hansen.

OPENING NIGHT

POPS

SYMPHONY HALL

WEDNESDAY MAY SIXTH

Orchestra of Symphony Players
Arthur Fiedler, Conductor
Popular Programmes
Refreshments.

News of Music

Trans. Apr. 30

Programs at The Pops

ALREADY Mr. Fiedler has assembled programs for the first five Pop Concerts—from the "opening night," Wednesday, May 6, through Sunday evening, May 10. The first program arrays familiar numbers, plus a selection from Mr. Gershwin's current musical play, "Girl Crazy," and a potpourri from Johann Strauss's Viennese operettas, mixed by Korngold. Ravel's "Bolero" will return on Thursday evening, with a Suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love, the Sorcerer," and two Canons of Schumann, transcribed from piano to orchestra, for freshening numbers. Chabrier's "Espana" will be played anew on Friday and Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," on Saturday. The program for the first Sunday concert, on May 10, is notable. It includes Lambert's "Rio Grande," warmly liked at three Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Sanroma again as pianist and The Cecilia for chorus; a neat little eighteenth-century Symphony by the Englishman, Boyce; Elgar's new march in the series he names "Pomp and Circumstance." There is room as well for three familiar numbers from Chaikovsky.

Pops Concerts to Open 46th Season

Trans. May 6

Following upon the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the season of Pop concerts will open in Symphony hall tonight at 8:30. This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler, their popular and successful leader of last year. The serving of refreshments and the new decoration of Symphony hall by Robert Edmond Jones will add to the particular flavor of the Pops as performed by a symphony orchestra of more than 80 symphony players.

Arthur Fiedler announces the following program for tonight:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss.....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Arranged by Harty
"Les Preludes".....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

The Specter of His Skill

Arthur Fiedler

Conductor of The Pops, the Cecilia, the MacDowell Club, the Esplanade and the Art Museum Concerts

(Photographic Fantasy by Llamas, Made at Symphony Hall and Used by Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts)

At The Pops Tonight

Trans. May 6

Opening Program

Rákóczy March.....Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia from the Opera, "Carmen" Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Harty
Tone-Poem, "Preludes".....Liszt
Selection from the Musical Play, "Girl Crazy".....Gershwin
Czardas.....Grossman
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Pops Tonight

Amer. May 6

The Pops for tonight follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Minuet (for string orchestra), Bolzoni; Fantasia "Carmen," Bizet; Tales from Johann Strauss Korngold; Londonderry Air, Harty; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2, Liszt; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Y, MAY 6, 1931

Monitor

Tonight at the Pops

OPENING NIGHT

Hungarian March, "Rakóczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
"Tales From Johann Strauss"...Korngold
"Londonderry Air"....Arranged by Harty
"Les Préludes".....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Pops Conductor

Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct the Pop concerts, which open Wednesday evening, May 6, at Symphony hall.

Pop Concerts to Open Wednesday

Next Wednesday night, May 6, in Symphony hall, the Pop concerts will open their 46th season, folowing on the 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Arthur Fiedler announces programs for this night and the remainder of the week, mingling past favorites with new numbers of interest.

Sunday, May 10, will bring the first Sunday night program, which is to be divided between English composers and the music of Tchaikovsky. Lambert's "The Rio Grande," with Sanroma as pianist, and the Cecilia Society Chorus assisting, will be a feature of this concert as well as the new "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 5 which, just written by Sir Edward Elgar, was recently first performed in his own country. Fiedler will also revive the Fifth Symphony of William Boyce, the 18th century British composer. The opening program is as follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet (for String Orchestra).....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss.....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Harty
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2.....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

OF THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

ul, Pays "In Person" V American Birth--No

May 3

A characteristic pose of Arthur Fiedler, who starts a new season as Pops director at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pops. Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Evenings at 8:30.

Opening Night, Wednesday, May 6—Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Minuet (for String Orchestra), Bolzoni; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Tales from Johann Strauss, Korngold; "Londonderry Air," arranged by Harty; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2, Liszt; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; Czardas from the Opera "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Thursday, May 7—Marche Militaire, Schubert; Overture, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Two Pieces in Canon Form, Schumann-Dubois; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "El Amor Brujo," Ballet Suite, De Falla; Scherzo (Pizzicato) from the Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; Bolero, Ravel; waltz from "The Bat," Strauss; "To a Water Lily," MacDowell; "Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner.

Friday, May 8—"Procession of Bacchus," Delibes; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Rosemunde," ballet music, Schubert; "Cavalleria Rusticana," fantasia, Mascagni; "Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "New Moon," selection, Romberg; "Waves of the Danube," waltz, Ivanovici; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Saturday, May 9—March, "Schechenyi Indulo," Fahrbach; "William Tell," overture, Rossini; Minuet from the "Clock" symphony, Haydn; "Aida," Fantasia, Verdi; "The Sorceror's Apprentice," Scherzo, Dukas; "Largo," Handel; "Ballet of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Nina Rosa," selection, Romberg; "Music of the Spheres," waltz, Josef Strauss; "Entrance of the Gladiators," Fucik.

Sunday, May 10—March, "Pomp and Circumstance," No. 5, Elgar; Fifth Symphony, Boyce; Londonderry Air, Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert; "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia, Tchaikovsky; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Overture Solonnelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

JORDAN HALL, Thursday at 8:15. Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph F. Wagner, conductor—"Scotch" Symphony, Mendelssohn; "The Lark Ascending," for violin and orchestra, Vaughan Williams; "Scarecrow Sketches," F. S. Converse; Havanaise, opus 83, for violin, Saint-Saens; Caucasian Sketches," Ippolitov-Ivanov. Soloist, Einar Hansen.

OPENING NIGHT

POPS

SYMPHONY HALL

WEDNESDAY MAY SIXTH

Orchestra of Symphony Players
Arthur Fiedler, Conductor
Popular Programmes
Refreshments.

News of Music

Trans. Apr. 30

Programs at The Pops

ALREADY Mr. Fiedler has assembled programs for the first five Pop Concerts—from the "opening night," Wednesday, May 6, through Sunday evening, May 10. The first program arrays familiar numbers, plus a selection from Mr. Gershwin's current musical play, "Girl Crazy," and a potpourri from Johann Strauss's Viennese operettas, mixed by Korngold. Ravel's "Bolero" will return on Thursday evening, with a Suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love, the Sorcerer," and two Canons of Schumann, transcribed from piano to orchestra, for freshening numbers. Chabrier's "España" will be played anew on Friday and Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," on Saturday. The program for the first Sunday concert, on May 10, is notable. It includes Lambert's "Rio Grande," warmly liked at three Symphony Concerts, with Mr. Sanroma again as pianist and The Cecilia for chorus; a neat little eighteenth-century Symphony by the Englishman, Boyce; Elgar's new march in the series he names "Pomp and Circumstance." There is room as well for three familiar numbers from Chaikovsky.

Pops Concerts to Open 46th Season

Trans. May 6

Following upon the 50th anniversary year of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the season of Pop concerts will open in Symphony hall tonight at 8:30. This will be the 46th season of the Pops and the second under Arthur Fiedler, their popular and successful leader of last year. The serving of refreshments and the new decoration of Symphony hall by Robert Edmond Jones will add to the particular flavor of the Pops as performed by a symphony orchestra of more than 80 symphony players.

Arthur Fiedler announces the following program for tonight:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss.....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Arranged by Harty
"Les Preludes".....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

The Specter of His Skill

Arthur Fiedler

Conductor of The Pops, the Cecilia, the MacDowell Club, the Esplanade and the Art Museum Concerts

(Photographic Fantasy by Llamas, Made at Symphony Hall and Used by Courtesy of the Museum of Fine Arts)

At The Pops Tonight

Trans. May 6

Opening Program

Rákóczy March.....Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia from the Opera, "Carmen" Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Harty
Tone-Poem, "Preludes".....Liszt
Selection from the Musical Play, "Girl Crazy".....Gershwin
Czardas.....Grossman
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Pops Tonight

Amer. May 6

The Pops for tonight follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Minuet (for string orchestra), Bolzoni; Fantasia "Carmen," Bizet; Tales from Johann Strauss Korngold; Londonderry Air, Harty; "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2, Liszt; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Y, MAY 6, 1931

Monitor

Tonight at the Pops

OPENING NIGHT

Hungarian March, "Rakóczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
"Tales From Johann Strauss"...Korngold
"Londonderry Air"....Arranged by Harty
"Les Préludes".....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

Pops Conductor

Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct the Pop concerts, which open Wednesday evening, May 6, at Symphony hall.

Pop Concerts to Open Wednesday

Next Wednesday night, May 6, in Symphony hall, the Pop concerts will open their 46th season, folowing on the 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Arthur Fiedler announces programs for this night and the remainder of the week, mingling past favorites with new numbers of interest.

Sunday, May 10, will bring the first Sunday night program, which is to be divided between English composers and the music of Tchaikovsky. Lambert's "The Rio Grande," with Sanroma as pianist, and the Cecilia Society Chorus assisting, will be a feature of this concert as well as the new "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 5 which, just written by Sir Edward Elgar, was recently first performed in his own country. Fiedler will also revive the Fifth Symphony of William Boyce, the 18th century British composer. The opening program is as follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Minuet (for String Orchestra).....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Tales from Johann Strauss.....Korngold
Londonderry Air.....Harty
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 2.....Liszt
"Girl Crazy," Selection.....Gershwin
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior".....Grossman
The Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

OF THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

ul, Pays "In Person" V American Birth--Nc

May 3

A characteristic pose of Arthur Fiedler, who starts a new season as Pops director at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

Ancient, Honorable and Annual Rite of the Bostonian Spring

Forty-Sixth Opening, Last Evening at Symphony Hall, of the Pop Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

From a Photograph Taken by Frank E. Colby of the Transcript Staff as Arthur Fiedler, Conductor, Was About to Begin the Fourth Number on the Program, a Fantasia from Bizet's Opera, "Carmen." The Summer Dress of the Hall, the Stage, the Orchestra and the First Six or Eight Rows of the Audience at the Tables Are All Shown

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of the Women's City Club

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Two Pieces in Canon Form...Schumann
(Arranged for Orchestra by Dubois)
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber
(Version for Orchestra by Berlioz)
Five Numbers from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer".....de Falla
Scherzo Pizzicato from the Fourth Symphony.....Chaikovsky
Bolero.....Ravel
Waltzes from the Operetta, "The Bat".....J. Strauss
To a Water Lily.....MacDowell
Introduction to Act III of the Opera, "Lohengrin".....Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Spring Is Here, Pops Are Proof

Opening Night of May, 1931, With All the Pleasures Of the Season

THE more it changes, the more it is the same thing, writes the reviewer returned from the forty-fifth renewal of the Pop Concerts and beginning, say, his twentieth article about that annual occasion. Forthwith meditation and recollection correct him. The Pops remain a unique Bostonian institution. Elsewhere in these United States no series of similar concerts flourishes, or ever has flourished, in spite of many attempts to imitate or transplant. Nor in these days, unless memory slips in its haste, is there any comparable series in Europe. Such as they were, the war and the aftermath sank them almost "without trace." Here in Boston, The Pops have survived a changed city, a changed public, changed minds, manners, habits and living—all that differentiates the nineteen-twenties and thirties from the eighteen-eighties and nineties.

A small and centered community has become a metropolitan district. A compact audience in its likings has expanded into variegated divisions and subdivisions. On this night and that, the earlier and the middle Pops had social cachet. The later Pops are informal and democratic. Horse-cars set us down at the old Music Hall. Trolley-cars conveyed us to Symphony Hall. Now, on an "opening night," tardy comers hunt for parking place. Through many years ales of Britain and wines of France and Germany were the emollients. Now we make shift with malted mixtures and pseudo-punches; while an unblushing menu proffers Pineapple Sundaes and Nut Taffy. (Good Lord, deliver us!) For better or for worse, to softer drinks have succeeded sedater manners. It is a long, long time since any gentleman-roisterer has hung a pair of trousers over the waiting arm of Apollo Belvedere.

As to "good light music" current tastes and current notions have also changed. The proof is written large in the volumes of early and middle programs scattered through the cases in the exhibition room at Symphony Hall. By tens, twenties and hundreds, items have come into favor and fashion; gone into neglect and oblivion. There was Mr. Gershwin to hear, last evening, out of the musical play, "Girl Crazy"; while twice over the audience insisted upon the waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time." Tonight in walk Messieurs de Falla and Ravel; while no farther away than Sunday come old Boyce out of the eighteenth century and young Mr. Lambert very much of this twentieth. Modern music and music in present vogue; but "good light music" withal, barring only that paltry and pestiferous film-waltz.

Eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra play it and decline seldom into the lassitude of summer and a hundred Symphony Concerts well behind. If they do—the weaknesses of the flesh and the spirit being what they are—the conductor brings them quickly back to the mark. Tireless himself, minded to give each piece its true and particular voice, Arthur Fiedler would have the orchestra as energetic and elastic. In him is the spark that keeps an audience in lively glow; but first it sets the players alight. . . . Fortunately for Boston, Henry Higginson grew up musically in Vienna where they then cultivated, and still cultivate, the lighter pleasures of the arts. Otherwise, there might have been only Symphony Concerts and no Pops. And they must be cheap as well as good, said this New England Maecenas, remembering a frugal folk. The prices have changed with the times; but who has ever begrudged them?

The rest is detail of an evening's pleasure. To please the eye the lush green, the tempered gold, the cooler grey of the seasonal decorations—brightness without heat as becomes an ideal summer; the frocks and frills, light, colorful and cut to the newest mode, upon one's neighbor's wife, one's neighbor's daughters and the next friend of the young man at the next table. To please the ear, the sound of music from composer and orchestra; the polite but never arbitrary silence that gave it room; between whiles the tinkle of gossip across the blue and gold tables for which, among frequenters, The Pops are a famous place. To please both eye and ear, the quick interest in music and performance; the pretty stir over a favorite and remembered "extra"; the good will toward conductor and orchestra; the gay mood, not easy for Bostonians to catch in a public place, but more in evidence at The Pops than at most other entertainments. The quick-witted and sympathetic Fiedler often chooses music to prompt it. Perhaps my lady's cigarette also helps—though not her Pineapple Sundae.

The program was summary of a proper Pops repertory: the march for rhythm and sonority—this time the "Rákóczy" sound and fury; the favorite overture—to "Oberon"; the operatic fantasia—from "Carmen"; the "popular classic"—Liszt's "Preludes"; the pretty trifle—Bolzoni's "Minuet"; the sentimental trifle—"The Londonderry Air"; waltzes, polkas and a czardas from Vienna or thereabouts; the potpourri from a recent American musical play—Mr. Gershwin's "Girl Crazy"; Wagner's Valkyrs hurtling the air and the brass; as many "extras" as Mr. Fiedler might give, which were five, some for the rhythm, some for the tune and all for the tickling of the ear and, maybe, the fancy. A nod to radio with Percy Grainger's "Country Gardens"; a bow to the films with that "Zwei Hertzen" waltz. For The Pops must keep touch with the times and the public.

Not much that was new hereabouts, except certain "Tales from Johann Strauss" and the "selection" from "Girl Crazy." Erich Korngold, who in his young days was a prodigy composer, strung together operetta-tunes, which few remembered; polkas and such like; the inevitable "Blue Danube," which everyone recognized, to make the "tales." M. Gers.

Amusements

SYMPHONY HALL
TONIGHT at 8.30
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER
Conductor
The Sunday program, May 10, will feature Lambert's "Rio Grande" and Tchaikovsky music.
PROGRAM CHANGED DAILY
Seats 50c, 75c, $1—2 Weeks in Advance

...in tossed in "Embraceable You," "I Got Rhythm" and other public necessities from "Girl Crazy"; also exhibited himself in his newest guise—less melody, more rhythm, a hard-driven orchestra, the modernist rather than the jazzy touch. Before long the last doubter will be calling him a "serious musician"—New York style. But the audience's ears and Mr. Fiedler's hand seemed warmer last evening, for Vienna. H. T. P.

Herald May 7

AS THE POPS GOT UNDER WAY

POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts, which opened last night in Symphony hall will give their 8:30. Arthur Fiedler announces the following program.

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Two Pieces in Canon Form ..... Schumann-Dubois
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
"El Amor Brujo," Ballet Suite ..... De Falla
Cherzo from the Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikovsky
Bolero ..... Ravel
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss
To a Water Lily ..... MacDowell
Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III ..... Wagner

Music

The Restored Pops

The forty-sixth season of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts was inaugurated last night with gladsome sights and sounds. The audience filled the hall. The gray and gold decorative scheme installed last year under the direction of Robert Edmond Jones [illegible] formed the cheerful setting. [illegible]ur Fiedler, beginning his second as master of musical ceremo- received an ovation on his en- e. Enthusiasm grew as the pro- advanced. There was the usual number of encores, one of which—a selection from "Zwei Herzen im ¾ Takt"—had to be played twice. Most of the auditors lingered for a late leave-taking.

Monitor May 7

All of which is testimony to the renewal and freshening of the Pops, now evidently once more firmly established in popular favor. The management, sensitive to the public pulse, recognized last year the necessity for a modification of the rather austere atmosphere maintained by Mr. Casella. Seeking the ameliorator, it fixed upon Mr. Fiedler, who indeed would have been hard to overlook after his success with the Esplanade concerts the previous summer. The choice has been justified.

The program of the opening night gives a clue to Mr. Fiedler's success. Three of the items are, or have been in the not remote past, a part of the repertory of symphony orchestras in subscription seasons. These are Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Liszt's "Les Préludes" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Even Berlioz's "Rakóczy" March has been heard in the course of such solemn rites. For the rest, more popular numbers—a Bolzoni Minuet, a fantasia of tunes from "Carmen," a Korngold potpourri of Straussian waltzes, the Harty arrangement of the Londonderry Air, selections from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and the Czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior."

Only pedants could protest that such scores as these latter are a disgrace to those hallowed walls. A Pop concert, by definition, is not a symphonic ceremony. Good tunes and lively rhythms are the proper accompaniment to the consumption of soft drinks and the patter of social interchange. And it must not be imagined that music easy to listen to is necessarily bad music, still less than it demands no musicianship in performance. There was some excellent playing last night. There was a Koussevitzkyan touch in the strong dynamic contrasts of the "Oberon" Overture. Liszt's somwhat jaded war-horse stepped through its paces as if it were just entering upon its career on the musical cinders. And the "lighter" stuff came to sprightly utterance. The Pops [illegible]

Cambridge May 7 31

THE "POPS"

Cambridge music-lovers join with those from all parts of metropolitan Boston in welcoming the return of the "Pops" for their 46th annual season at Symphony hall. They will find Symphony hall newly-decorated for the occasion by Robert Edmond Jones and Conductor Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of 80 players from the Boston Symphony ready to provide the kind of programs which Boston audiences appreciate.

"Pops" audiences are a revelation to visitors from other cities, for in few places is true appreciation of music so generally distributed through the community. The "Pops" programs have helped to create this spirit of appreciation by a careful admixture of the best in music with other selections of a more popular nature. Only by such institutions [illegible]ot [illegible]t [illegible]s

Lily" and the third-act prelude from "Lohengrin."

Pops Season Opens Auspiciously, With Quartet at Every Floor Table

Arthur Fiedler's second term as conducter of the Pops and the 46th season of that Bostonian institution opened joyously last evening in Symphony hall. As evidence that Mr. Fiedler's fame is not ephemeral, every floor table had its quartet of eager listeners and smokers; the balconies showed no empty spots. There were no polite ceremonials. The concert began promptly on time, and Mr. Fiedler, after an incisive acknowledgement of noisy greetings plunged into his first number, the "Rakoczy" march by Berlioz. The new season was on.

For a majority of those present the summer decorations of stage and walls and tables, first revealed a year ago, were now familiar; the latticed framework in gray and gold, which served as setting for the musicians; the grass-green tints along the lower side walls of the hall; the gay green tables and the gilded chairs about them. For those viewing these seasonal changes as innovations they were agreable and refreshing. It will be recalled that the color scheme was that of Robert Edmond Jones, an artist of more than passing renown.

Back to the music. Mr. Fiedler has gained in confidence within the year. Never afflicted with mannerisms, never guilty of spurious gesticulations, he reads calmly, even cautiously. He is not disdainful of honest applause, would share it with his band invariably. Last evening he added five encores to his program and thereby bound his audience closer to him; for Pops audiences dearly love their encores. He ranged from Weber's "Oberon" overture on to Bolzoni's minuet for string orchestra, a fantasia on Bizet's "Carmen," Korngold's "Tales from Johann Strauss" "last year it was Richard Strauss who was honored), Kreisler's "Londonderry Air," arranged by Si Hamilton Harty, for violin solo by the concet master, Julius Theodorowicz, Liszt's "Les Preludes," selections from George Gershwin's "Girl Crazy," the czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," to Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

Again it was noticeable that Mr. Fiedler has a fine talent for program making. A standard march and overture, a waltz, an operatic pot-pourri, at least one meaty classic like "Les Preludes," played last tvening with full symphonic resonance, a selection from some current musical comedy, and for balance and complement lighter pieces, [illegible]rticularly in the matter of extra [illegible]mbers. We cherish a modest hope [illegible]t Mr. Fiedler was impressed by one

Pops Concerts

People's Editor: Traw. May 7

Now that the Pops season is here, many hundreds of music lovers will have an opportunity to relax their weary nerves to the melodic and rhythmic tunes that Arthur Fiedler will render.

This is an institution that every Bostonian should feel proud of, for such an excellent orchestra is the unusual rather than the usual.

However, we should not forget that there are many among us who love music above everything else, yet, I am sorry to say, that these fellow-citizens will not be able to attend the concerts. The reason is very simple—lack of finance.

If the necessities of life can come down, surely there is good reason to believe that entertainment, particularly wholesome entertainment, should reach a lower price.

I am advocating 25c. seats. This is no innovation, but actually existed until very recently. This will not interfere with the policy now in force but will keep all the second balcony seats occupied by those who would otherwise be unable to share the higher joys of life.

It is little changes such as this that sooner or later consummate into decided benefits for the citizenry as a whole.

In turbulent times such as we are now experiencing, it is a civic duty to see that constructiveness should be fostered. I sincerely believe that by offering 25c. seats the management of the Pops will be doing the right thing at the proper time.

Brookline. SIDNEY LACOB.

DAILY RECORD, Thursday, Ma

HUB'S FAMED POP CONCERTS IN 46th YEAR

Boston's unique Pop concerts began their 46th season at Symphony Hall last night with Arthur Fiedler again as conductor. These entertainments with their popular music and light refreshments for those sitting at tables, started in the pre-Volstead days and have flourished even during the dry era. The drink and food are incidental, but still enjoyable. What most people relish above everything else is the music, which brings back the favorite dances and overtures of by gone days and also introduces hits from Broadway shows.

Mr. Fiedler, excellent musician and expert program maker, is one of the most popular leaders the Pops have ever had. Under his baton are 80 members of the Symphony orchestra.

For tonight's concert Mr. Fiedler offers Schubert's "Marche Militaire," Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Dubois' arrangement of two Schumann themes, Berlioz' arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," De Falla's "Amor Brujo" ballet suite, the scherzo from Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, Ravel's famous "Bolero," Strauss' "Bat" waltz, MacDowell's "To a Water

OSTON POST, THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1931

2.2

Pops Season Opened With Fine Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As pendant to the 50th season of Symphony Concerts there began at Symphony Hall last evening the 46th season of Pops and the second of Arthur Fiedler's conductorship.

As was the case a year ago, the hall itself had shed its winter raiment of red for a spring dress of green and gold.

HALL IS FILLED

If the size of the audience at this first concert is any criterion the Pops will be as well attended this year as they were last, "hard times" notwithstanding. There was almost literally not an inch of space on the floor untenanted and every seat in the two balconies appeared to be filled.

Mr. Fiedler made his opening programme out of pieces old and new, pieces frankly light and pieces at least semi-serious. The actual novelties were a medley of Strauss waltzes and polkas from the pen of Erich Korngold; a pleasing arrangement of the familiar Londonderry Air for solo violin, harp and strings by Sir Hamilton Harty; a selection from George Gershwin's latest musical comedy, "Girl Crazy"; and a conventionally effective Czardos from an opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," by one Grossman, otherwise unknown to these parts. Included among the extra numbers, plentiful throughout the evening, was one not unnaturally new to the Pops this year, the pretty waltz from the talkie-operetta, "Zwei Herzen in Drei-Viertel Takt."

Familiar Pieces Heard

The familiar pieces were the Rakoczy March of Berlioz, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Bolzoni's Minuet for strings, a Fantasia on "Carmen," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's riding Valkyries.

In fact as well as in name the orchestra was the Boston Symphony, reduced to 80 men and minus certain illustrious "first desks," but tonally and otherwise its virtuoso self.

As conductor Mr. Fiedler is hardly an individualist, but in these days of highly personal and occasionally eccentric readings his straightforward presentation of the music in hand is not unwelcome. At least Mr. Fiedler is never listless, his conducting has plenty of "pep" and in the mechanics of that art he grows steadily.

A second season of Pop concerts finds him ripened, more the master of himself, his music and his men. And his popularity is incontestable. He was greeted with enthusiasm when first he appeared last evening and hardly a piece on the programme failed to bring forth enough applause to warrant an extra number.

Globe MUSIC May 7

SYMPHONY HALL

The Pops

To the not altogether incongruous harmony of the tinkling of glasses, bottles and cracked ice the Pops began its 46th season last evening. There was the usual and pleasantly remembered hum of subdued yet happily frivolous conversation, the ease-inducing aura of tobacco smoke rising to fill the nostrils of the classic and stonily tolerant statues that fill the niches in the upper regions of Symphony Hall. As in years past, the bright, festal colors of evening gowns mingled with the sombreness of dinner coats and street dress and gave the gathering a certain cosmopolitan appearance. The hall was filled.

While Robert Edmond Jones' decorative scheme used in Symphony Hall this season was instituted last year, commendation of its effectiveness and consistent good taste is by no means stale or superfluous. The green walls and tables lend a restful coolness to the scene; the gilded chairs and latticework of the stage walls and door borders provides just the proper amount of contrast to make the interior of Symphony Hall resplendent and attractive.

The highlights of Mr Fiedler's program were Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," a fantasia on excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the so-called "Londonderry Air," selections from George Gershwin's score for "Girl Crazy" and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

There is to point in applying severe critical judgment either to the performance or the programs of such concerts as these. There is no pretense of maintaining high and rigid artistic standards. All highbrow esthetic considerations are subordinated to the effort to give the greatest pleasure to the greatest number. As such the concerts are offered; as such they should be received.

It is not amiss, however, to say that there are more good tunes in Bizet's great score than those heard in the "Carmen" fantasia last evening. The arrangement performed seemed to be an ill-balanced and crudely assembled jumble. It is also impossible not to reflect upon just why it is that sincere and conscientious musicians can transform such a noble melody as the "Londonderry Air" into the orchestral hash heard last evening, with its shuddering low strings, shrieking high ones, and a frantically palpitating harp.

Possibly the fact of the reduced numbers of the players from full Boston Symphony strength had something to do with the lack of the customary depth and glow of the strings, together with a distortion of the tonal balance.

M. Fiedler is a sincere, energetic, and competent routine conductor. It is not to be expected that a musician who has been conducting a large orchestra for but relatively few years should immediately become an interpreter of the first rank. But Mr Fiedler's work has improved notably in the past year, and the future appears to hold much in store.

The audience received conductor, players, and program, and no doubt the enjoyable privileges of smoking and eating, with evident gusto. Once more the Pops are with us. And we hope that it will always be so at this season of the year.

AS THE POPS GOT UNDER WAY

Pops Season Opens Auspiciously, With Quartet at Every Floor Table

Arthur Fiedler's second term as conductor of the Pops and the 46th season of that Bostonian institution opened joyously last evening in Symphony hall. As evidence that Mr. Fiedler's fame is not ephemeral, every floor table had its quartet of eager listeners and smokers; tht balconies showed no empty spots. There were no polite ceremonials. The concert began promptly on time, and Mr. Fiedler, after an incisive acpnowledgement of noisy greetings plunged into his first number, the "Rakoczy" march by Berlioz. The new season was on.

For a majority of those present the summer decorations of stage and walls and tables, first revealed a year ago, were now familiar; the latticed framework in gray and gold, which served as setting for the musicians; the grass-green tints along the lower side walls of the hall; the gay green tables and the gilded chairs about them. For those viewing these seasonal changes as innovations they were agreeable and refreshing. It will be recalled that the color scheme was that of Robert Edmond Jones, an artist of more than passing renown.

Back to the music. Mr. Fiedler has gained in confidence within the year. Never afflicted with mannerisms, never guilty of spurious gesticulations, he reads calmly, even cautiously. He is not disdainful of honest applause, would share it with his band invariably. Last evening he added five encores to his program and thereby bound his audience closer to him; for Pops audiendces dearly love their encores. He ranged from Weber's "Oberon" overture on to Bolzoni's minuet for string orchestra, a fantasia on Bizet's "Carmen," Korngold's "Tales from Johann Strauss" "last year it was Richard Strauss who was honored). Kreisler's "Londonderry Air," arranged by Si Hamilton Harty, for violin solo by the concet master, Julius Theodorowicz, Liszt's "Les Preludes," selections from George Gershwin's "Girl Crazy," the czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," to Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

Again it was noticeable that Mr. Fiedler has a fine talent for program making. A standard march and overture, a waltz, an operatic pot-pourri, at least one meaty classic like "Les Preludes," played last tvening with full symphonic resonance, a selection from some current musical comedy, and for balance and complement lighter pieces, particularly in the matter of extra numbers. We cherish a modest hope that Mr. Fiedler was impressed by one number of encores, one of which—a selection from "Zwei Herzen im ¾ Takt"—had to be played twice. Most of the auditors lingered for a late leave-taking.

All of which is testimony to the renewal and freshening of the Pops, now evidently once more firmly established in popular favor. The management, sensitive to the public pulse, recognized last year the necessity for a modification of the rather austere atmosphere maintained by Mr. Casella. Seeking the ameliorator, it fixed upon Mr. Fiedler, who indeed would have been hard to overlook after his success with the Esplanade concerts the previous summer. The choice has been justified.

The program of the opening night gives a clue to Mr. Fiedler's success. Three of the items are, or have been in the not remote past, a part of the repertory of symphony orchestras in subscription seasons. These are Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Liszt's "Les Préludes" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Even Berlioz's "Rakóczy" March has been heard in the course of such solemn rites. For the rest, more popular numbers—a Bolzoni Minuet, a fantasia of tunes from "Carmen," a Korngold potpourri of Straussian waltzes, the Harty arrangement of the Londonderry Air, selections from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and the Czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior."

Only pedants could protest that such scores as these latter are a disgrace to those hallowed walls. A Pop concert, by definition, is not a symphonic ceremony. Good tunes and lively rhythms are the proper accompaniment to the consumption of soft drinks and the patter of social interchange. And it must not be imagined that music easy to listen to is necessarily bad music, still less than it demands no musicianship in performance. There was some excellent playing last night. There was a Koussevitzkyan touch in the strong dynamic contrasts of the "Oberon" Overture. Liszt's somwhat jaded war-horse stepped through its paces as if it were just entering upon its career on the musical cinders. And the "lighter" stuff came to sprightly utterance. The Pops deserve their popularity. L. A. S.

Pops Concerts

People's Editor:

Now that the Pops season many hundreds of music lovers have an opportunity to relax their weary nerves to the melodic and rhythmic tunes that Arthur Fiedler will render.

This is an institution that every Bostonian should feel proud of, for such an excellent orchestra is the unusual rather than the usual.

However, we should not forget that there are many among us who love music above everything else, yet, I am sorry to say, that these fellow-citizens will not be able to attend the concerts. The reason is very simple—lack of finance.

If the necessities of life can come down, surely there is good reason to believe that entertainment, particularly wholesome entertainment, should reach a lower price.

I am advocating 25c. seats. This is no innovation, but actually existed until very recently. This will not interfere with the policy now in force but will keep all the second balcony seats occupied by those who would otherwise be unable to share the higher joys of life.

It is little changes such as this that sooner or later consummate into decided benefits for the citizenry as a whole.

In turbulent times such as we are now experiencing, it is a civic duty to see that constructiveness should be fostered. I sincerely believe that by offering 25c. seats the management of the Pops will be doing the right thing at the proper time.

Brookline. SIDNEY LACOB.

DAILY RECORD, Thursday, Ma

HUB'S FAMED POP CONCERTS IN 46th YEAR

Boston's unique Pop concerts began their 46th season at Symphony Hall last night with Arthur Fiedler again as conductor. These entertainments with their popular music and light refreshments for those sitting at tables, started in the pre-Volstead days and have flourished even during the dry era. The drink and food are incidental, but still enjoyable. What most people relish above everything else is the music, which brings back the favorite dances and overtures of by gone days and also introduces hits from Broadway shows.

Mr. Fiedler, excellent musician and expert program maker, is one of the most popular leaders the Pops have ever had. Under his baton are 80 members of the Symphony orchestra.

For tonight's concert Mr. Fiedler offers Schubert's "Marche Militaire," Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Dubois' arrangement of two Schumann themes, Berlioz' arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," De Falla's "Amor Brujo" ballet suite, the scherzo from Tchaikovsky's

POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts, which opened last night in Symphony hall will give their 8:30. Arthur Fiedler announces the following program.

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Two Pieces in Canon Form ..... Schumann-Dubois
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
"El Amor Brujo," Ballet Suite ..... De Falla
Cherzo from the Fourth Symphony ..... Tschaikovsky
Bolero ..... Ravel
Waltz from "The Bat" ..... Strauss
To a Water Lily ..... MacDowell
Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III ..... Wagner

Mu

The Reston

The forty-sixth sea... provinces and Tilley. Mr. exter must is lir it is telep' phony Hall Pop con... gurated last night ... sights and sounds. Th... filled the hall. The gray and gold decorative scheme installed last year under the direction of Robert Edmond Jones ... n formed the cheerful setting. ...ur Fiedler, beginning his second as master of musical ceremo- received an ovation on his en- ...e. Enthusiasm grew as the pro- advanced. There was the usual

monitor May 7

...incident of this enjoyable evening. In resporse to a conscientious interpretation of excerpts from the Gershwin opus, "Girl Crazy," with its slightly laboredmeldoies, he struck into that glorious waltz movement from "Zwei Herzen in Three-quarter Takt," by Robert Stoltz, from the motion picture of that name. It was over too soon, as the clamor for more indicated. So, after taking his seat, Mr. Fiedler played it again. Gustav Struber, in his day, would have needed no urging. Now, as then, German operetta, if given a chance, might outweigh in popular esteem the jazzed dissonances of con- ... W. E. G.

POSTON POST, THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1931

Pops Season Opened With Fine Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As pendant to the 50th season of Symphony Concerts there began at Symphony Hall last evening the 46th season of Pops and the second of Arthur Fiedler's conductorship.

As was the case a year ago, the hall itself had shed its winter raiment of red for a spring dress of green and gold.

HALL IS FILLED

If the size of the audience at this first concert is any criterion the Pops will be as well attended this year as they were last, "hard times" notwithstanding. There was almost literally not an inch of space on the floor untenanted and every seat in the two balconies appeared to be filled.

Mr. Fiedler made his opening programme out of pieces old and new, pieces frankly light and pieces at least semi-serious. The actual novelties were a medley of Strauss waltzes and polkas from the pen of Erich Korngold; a pleasing arrangement of the familiar Londonderry Air for solo violin, harp and strings by Sir Hamilton Harty; a selection from George Gershwin's latest musical comedy, "Girl Crazy"; and a conventionally effective Czardos from an opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," by one Grossman, otherwise unknown to these parts. Included among the extra numbers, plentiful throughout the evening, was one not unnaturally new to the Pops this year, the pretty waltz from the talkie-operetta, "Zwei Herzen in Drei-Viertel Takt."

Familiar Pieces Heard

The familiar pieces were the Rakoczy March of Berlioz, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Bolzoni's Minuet for strings, a Fantasia on "Carmen," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's riding Valkyries.

In fact as well as in name the orchestra was the Boston Symphony, reduced to 80 men and minus certain illustrious "first desks," but tonally and otherwise its virtuoso self.

As conductor Mr. Fiedler is hardly an individualist, but in these days of highly personal and occasionally eccentric readings his straightforward presentation of the music in hand is not unwelcome. At least Mr. Fiedler is never listless, his conducting has plenty of "pep" and in the mechanics of that art he grows steadily.

A second season of Pop concerts finds him ripened, more the master of himself, his music and his men. And his popularity is incontestable. He was greeted with enthusiasm when first he appeared last evening and hardly a piece on the programme failed to bring forth enough applause to warrant an extra number.

Globe MUSIC May 7

SYMPHONY HALL
The Pops

To the not altogether incongruous harmony of the tinkling of glasses, bottles and cracked ice the Pops began its 46th season last evening. There was the usual and pleasantly remembered hum of subdued yet happily frivolous conversation, the ease-inducing aura of tobacco smoke rising to fill the nostrils of the classic and stonily tolerant statues that fill the niches in the upper regions of Symphony Hall. As in years past, the bright, festal colors of evening gowns mingled with the sombreness of dinner coats and street dress and gave the gathering a certain cosmopolitan appearance. The hall was filled.

While Robert Edmond Jones' decorative scheme used in Symphony Hall this season was instituted last year, commendation of its effectiveness and consistent good taste is by no means stale or superfluous. The green walls and tables lend a restful coolness to the scene; the gilded chairs and latticework of the stage walls and door borders provides just the proper amount of contrast to make the interior of Symphony Hall resplendent and attractive.

The highlights of Mr Fiedler's program were Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," a fantasia on excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the so-called "Londonderry Air," selections from George Gershwin's score for "Girl Crazy" and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

There is io point in applying severe critical judgment either to the performance or the programs of such concerts as these. There is no pretense of maintaining high and rigid artistic standards. All highbrow esthetic considerations are subordinated to the effort to give the greatest pleasure to the greatest number. As such the concerts are offered; as such they should be received.

It is not amiss, however, to say that there are more good tunes in Bizet's great score than those heard in the "Carmen" fantasia last evening. The arrangement performed seemed to be an ill-balanced and crudely assembled jumble. It is also impossible not to reflect upon just why it is that sincere and conscientious musicians can transform such a noble melody as the "Londonderry Air" into the orchestral hash heard last evening, with its shuddering low strings, shrieking high ones, and a frantically palpitating harp.

Possibly the fact of the reduced numbers of the players from full Boston Symphony strength had something to do with the lack of the customary depth and glow of the strings, together with a distortion of the tonal balance.

M. Fiedler is a sincere, energetic, and competent routine conductor. It is not to be expected that a musician who has been conducting a large orchestra for but relatively few years should immediately become an interpreter of the first rank. But Mr Fiedler's work has improved notably in the past year, and the future appears to hold much in store.

The audience received conductor, players, and program, and no doubt the enjoyable privileges of smoking and eating, with evident gusto. Once more the Pops are with us. And we hope that it will always be so at this season of the year.

...ston at Symphony hall. They will find Symphony hall newly-decorated for the occasion by Robert Edmond Jones and Conductor Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of 80 players from the Boston Symphony ready to provide the kind of programs which Boston audiences appreciate.

"Pops" audiences are a revelation to visitors from other cities, for in few places is true appreciation of music so generally distributed through the community. The "Pops" programs have helped to create this spirit of appreciation by a careful admixture of the best in music with other selections of a more popular nature. Only by such institutions can the love for true music be kept alive and increasingly strong against the tide of jazz which now seems to be ebbing.

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1931 Amer.

POPS CROWDED

Triumph for Fiedler at Opening

By MOSES SMITH

A review of the opening of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall without some mention of the weather and of spring tra-la and of a young man's and young woman's fancy would be unthinkable. No reviewer has ever done it, and I cannot betray my tribe by attempting it.

The weather, then, was fine. The company was fine, a crowded hall of company, in happy spirits and in party clothes (it is also a hallowed tradition to refer to the gay women's frocks). How much the ginger ale and pretzels contributed to the gaiety is unmeasurable. But it is pleasant to sit and sip; to somke to your heart's content and neighbor's discomfort.

* * *

There was also a program of music, for what would a concert be like without music? "Dispensing" this music was an orchestra on stage, containing most of the Boston Symphony group. Arthur Fiedler, who brought the Pops back to their former popularity last year, was on hand for the beginning of his second season. His position in the affections of his audience was unquestionable as one listened to the applause greeting him when he first came on stage, or after each of the numbers had been played.

Much of Fiedler's success is traceable to personal popularity, an engaging manner, a personality adapted to showmanship. But much of it, too, is due to his judgment in balancing programs to meet the likes of a varied audience. Yesterday's program was more or less typical. There was the "Rakoczy" March of Berlioz for spirited and brilliant beginning; the romantic (and familiar) Overture to Weber's "Oberon"; a charming Minuet by Bolzoni, and a Fantasia from "Carmen" for the operatically-minded.

* * *

Then snatches of Strauss Waltzes, via the Viennese Komgold; the Londonderry Air in an arrangement by Sir Hamilton Harty that did not do violence to sentiment, with the violin solo exquisitely played by Julius Theodorowicz; "Les Preludes" by Liszt, the "heaviest" piece on the program.

George Gershwin poked his head into this circle with the sophisticated (and slightly labored) jazz of "Girl Crazy." The following encore, the waltz from "Zwei Herzen in ¾ Takt" was so well received that it had to be repeated. A Czardas from Crossman's "Ghost of the Warrior" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" brought up the rear.

* * *

Mr. Fiedler has gained commendably in authority in the year since he took charge of Pops. His beat is cleverer and more incisive—forgive a reviewer for noticing such things at a Pop concert—he seems more certain in his knowledge of how he would like to have the music played, and more confident of his ability to get the men to play it as he wants it. His self-consciousness has for the most part gone, and he is now making music rather than reading it.

He is the first Pop conductor in a long while who can get his orchestra to transmit jazz in its familiar spirit. In Viennese music he is very much at home; the encored waltz was played with notable snap. For these things alone an audience, particularly an American audience on a spring evening, would be grateful. The enthusiasm of last night's crowd is probably indicative of an even more successful Pops season than Fiedler's first.

(On Saturday.)

POP CONCERTS HAVE GALA OPENING

Traveler May 7 31

Boston's unique and historic "Pops" opened to a full house at Symphony hall last evening, when Arthur Fiedler, for his second season, led an orchestra of 80 Symphony players in the first of the programs of lighter music which provide entertainment for music-lovers for the 46th spring season.

An adept at the skilful art of program-making, Mr. Fiedler's selection for opening night found warm response from a capacity audience. With Berlioz, Weber, Bolzoni, Bizet, Korngold, Harty, Liszt, Gerswhin, Grossman and Wagner on the published program and with the inclusion of such old favorites as "To a Water Lily," by MacDowell, and such new ones as the melodic "Zwei Herzen Im 3/4 Takt," and it would be hard to go wrong with an audience that knows each selection will be brought to its finest performance. Perhaps there is more than an indication of the listeners' preference in the fact that the catchy German waltz tune had to be repeated.

All the fresh green coloring and gold lattice of last season transform the subdued aspects of the auditorium into one entirely in keeping with the musical mood. There are as usual light refreshments and light drinks served to those on the floor, and for those who seek the Bohemian atmosphere, plenty of smoke to create the proper illusion.

Certainly Boston is gratified to once again have the privilege to hear music that in this and future programs runs the gamut from Haydn to Romberg, from Schubert to Gershwin, all played at the high standard of excellence that Mr. Fiedler and his men attain. The Pops are held nightly, including Sunday, at an admission charge that places

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

First Sunday Pop Concert

The items of chief interest at the season's first Sunday Pop Concert last evening were the revival by Mr Fiedler of the Fifth Symphony by William Boyce, the 18th century English composer, and Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grand," introduced here at the Symphony concerts two weeks ago. As before, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Murray, contralto, and a chorus from the Cecilia Society assisted in the latter piece. The remainder of the program was devoted to Sir Edward Elgar's recently written "Pomp and Circumstance," march No 5, which was played in Boston for the first time, and to Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite, "1812" overture, and a fantasia on his "Romeo and Juliet" music.

The symphony proved to be engaging music, characteristic of the musical period and style, nimble and graceful if not airy. Boyce's melodic invention, while quite without subtlety—as was also his manipulation, apparently—has a solidity and variety that are pleasing. There were some interesting high passages for the trumpets.

This "symphony"—such it is in name, though it is not a symphony in the modern sense of the word—ought to be a welcome addition to the Pops' repertory. Perhaps Mr Fiedler may favor his audiences with some or all of the other seven.

By no stretch of imagination can Lambert's music be called great. In fact, one has a sneaking suspicion that he had no such thought when he composed it. Melodically and harmonically it becomes banal in a few places. One or two of his uses of percussion are inept.

On the other hand, "Rio Grande" is genial, warm-blooded music that is virtually never dull; it has variety of instrumentation and melody. It is stimulating, and for that reason ought to be heard more than rarely.

Mr Fiedler's performance of the "Rio Grande" may have been less replete with subtle details than the previous performances of the work here, but he alone, apparently, has been able to secure the proper rhythm. For that reason "Rio Grande" sounded better than ever last evening. There was much applause for conductor, soloists and orchestra.

"POPS OPEN IN BOSTON"

Prov Journal May 10

Boston's annual "Pop" concerts opened for their 46th season in Symphony Hall last week with Arthur Fiedler continuing as conductor of the group of Boston Symphony Orchestra players. The Cecelia Society and Jesus Maria Sanroma, recently soloist with the University Glee Club, will assist tonight at the first Sunday evening program. The program will have a new "Pomp and Circumstance" march by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by William Boyce, 18th century British composer; "Londonderry Air," Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert, and three works by Tschaikowski, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The program announced by Mr. Fiedler last week include not only the lighter numbers from the "classic" composers but some of the operetta music of today such as excerpts from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and Romberg's "Nina Rose" and "New Moon."

AND MUSICIANS

Globe May 10

Boyce's Symphony At Pops

Mr Fiedler will revive at the season's first Sunday evening Pops concert tonight, the fifth symphony of William Boyce, an 18th century composer. Like many another musician of prominence and esteem during life, Boyce has been almost forgotten, and most of his music has lain neglected. According to the indices in both the original and the revised editions of M. A. DeWolfe Howe's history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, none of Boyce's music ever has been performed at the Symphony concerts.

Boyce, the son of a cabinet maker, was born in London on Feb 7, 1710. In early youth he became a chorister at St Paul's Cathedral, and later a pupil of Maurice Greene, organist of the cathedral. At the age of 24, he obtained the position of organist of Oxford Chapel, and continued the study of musical theory.

He set to music, at the same age, a masque called "Peleus and Thetis," by Lord Lansdowne. While still a young man Boyce's hearing became impaired. But even under this misfortune, the most severe that could happen to a musician, the young composer did not lose courage or ardor for musical study.

In 1736, when he was 26, Boyce gave up his Oxford Chapel position and was sworn into the office of "composer to the Chapel Royal." He was commissioned in 1749 to write the music for an ode to be performed at the installation of Henry Pelham, Duke of Newcastle, as Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. In recognition of the merit of this music, the university bestowed upon him the degree of Doctor of Music.

Boyce is perhaps best known for his "Cathedral Music," a collection of ecclesiastical works written by English composer during the preceding 200 years. This collection was begun by Boyce's teacher, Greene, but the pupil, upon the master's death, was bequeathed such material as Greene had already assembled and did most of the work upon the anthology.

Boyce was prolific in composition and left behind him anthems, songs, services, 12 sonatas for two violins and bass, and eight symphonies. He died on Feb 7, 1779, at the age of 69, from gout.

The symphonies, of which the fifth is the one to be heard tonight, were transcribed and edited for strings and "optional wind instruments" in 1928 by Constant Lambert, the young English modernist composer, whose "Rio Grande" also will be played by Mr Fiedler this evening.

In his preface to this edition Lambert says the symphonies were later works of Boyce, and—this, of course, without malice—"there is little doubt that these symphonies were written when the composer had completely lost hearing." Lambert considers them to resemble the old concerti grossi rather than the modern symphony, however.

Lambert has arranged the symphonies so that they may be played either with or without the wind instruments. In the fifth may be used two oboes and two trumpets. The symphonies are not long. An English musical authority claims that they were put together from overtures to various royal odes which it was Boyce's duty to turn out from time to time as master of the King's band. The fifth symphony has three parts, an allegro and two dance sections—a gavotte and a minuet.

It will be interesting to hear this ancient music replayed after so many years.

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pops; Arthur Fiedler, conductor. Evenings at 8:30. Tonight:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance," No. 5, Elgar; Fifth Symphony, Boyce; Londonderry Air, arranged by Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert; "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia, Tchaikovsky; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky.

Tuesday, May 12—Polonaise, Chopin; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Minuet, Boccherini; "Madame Butterfly," fantasia, Puccini; "Peer Gynt" suite, Grieg; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; "Girl Crazy," selection, Gershwin; "Artist's Life" waltz, Strauss; Hungarian March, Berlioz.

Wednesday, May 13—Wedding march from "Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; overture to The Flying Dutchman, Wagner; Waltz No. 15, Brahms-Gericke; "La Source," ballet suite, Delibes; "Danse Macabre," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; finale of Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Roses of the South," waltz, Strauss; "Sheep and Goat," Gulon; prelude to "Carmen," Bizet.

Thursday, May 14—March from the Cantata "Caractacus," Elgar; overture to "Miagnon," Thomas; Andante, Handel; ballet music from "Faust," Gounod; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death, Wagner; scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; third movement from "Pathetic" Symphony, Tchaikovsky; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; "Reconciliation Polka," from "The Millions of Harlequin," Drigo; "Panaderos," Spanish dance, Glazounov.

Friday, May 15—March, "On the Mall," Goldman; overture to "La Dame Blanche," Boieldieu; prelude, Rachmaninoff; bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Espana," waltz, Waldteufel; "Tambourin Chinois," Kreisler; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; "Nina Rosa," selection, Romberg; "Country Garden," Grainger; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Saturday, May 16—"Pomp and Circumstance,' march, No. 1, Elgar; overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein-Herbert; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; "Dubinushka," Russian folk song, arranged by Jacchia; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; Indian war dance, Skilton; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Turkey in the Straw," arranged by Guion.

FINE ARTS MUSEUM—Tuesday at 8. The Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director.

"My Spirit Be Joyful," J. S. Bach; "Jesu Dulcis," Tommaso da Vittoria; "Spring Returns," Marenzio; "Inimici Autem," Orlandus di Lassus; "April Is in My Mistress' Face," Thomas Morley; "Turn Ye to Me," Scotch folk song; choruses from "Pinafore," Sir Arthur Sullivan; "Ave Verum," William Byrd; "Salamaleikum," Peter Cornelius; "The Hundred Pipers," Scotch folk song; "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," J. S. Bach; Coronation Scene from "Boris Godunov," Moussorgsky.

MUSIC

Globe May 10

Music Notes and Comment

At the first Sunday evening Pops concert tonight, which begins the second week of the season, Mr Fiedler will introduce to Boston Sir Edward Elgar's recently completed "Pomp and Circumstance" march No. 5. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Murray, contralto, and a chorus from the Cecilia Society will assist in Lambert's "The Rio Grande."

Except for tomorrow night, when the house will be taken over as a benefit for the Home for Jewish Children, each concert of the week will be open to the public.

The second free concert at the Museum of Fine Arts will be given Tuesday evening by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr Archibald Davison, director. As heretofore the museum will open at 7 in the evening, and all galleries will be open to the public until 11.

At the benefit Pops concert tomorrow evening Gertrude Ehrhart, soprano, well known locally, will be the soloist. She will sing songs by Shubert, Steinert, Nevin, Saminsky and Hue. This concert will not be open to the public.

MUSIC

Herald May 11

THE POPS

The first Pops Sunday evening Symphony concert was attended by an audience that packed Symphony hall, and that showed its pleasure not only by much applause but by many shouts of "Bravo!" during the evening.

The program was as follows:

Elgar
March "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 (First time in Boston)
Boyce ..... Fifth Symphony
Londonderry Air
Arranged for String Orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty
Lambert ..... "The Rio Grande" for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte
(Piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
(Contralto solo, Marie Murray)
(Chorus of the Cecilia Society)
Tchaikovsky ..... "Romeo and Juliet" Overture--Fantasia
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"

The occasional small errors, lack of surface polish, and other evidences of weariness from the strain of a long, hard season and the haste with which Pops concerts must be prepared and given, which showed in the orchestra's playing last night, were more than made up for by its spirit and verve. Mr. Fiedler sets sharp, invigorating rhythms, has a clear, incisive beat, and, while he sometimes lacks graciousness in phrasing, he never errs in the direction of sentimentality—a fault which is insupportable in popular programs.

As to the program, it combined pieces by British composers (from the almost forgotten Boyce to Lambert, whose "Rio Grande" was one of the best liked of the new compositions brought out by the Boston Symphony this winter), with three selections from Tchaikovsky's best-liked works. The Elgar march, re-echoing an earlier "Pomp annd Circumstance," is less straightforward, more fussy, than the first, while built around the same over-romanticised themes. Boyce's clean, fresh Symphony, with its neat fugue, was refreshing after the preceding piece's ponderous strivings. Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the well-known "Londonderry Air," a charmingly appropriate arrangement, at last, of this much mauled and overplayed, but still lovely air, was played very suavely by the strings, the air being sung by solo violin.

Lambert's "Rio Grande" which was played with all the deft rhythm, sparkle and changing mood that it demands, again made a favorable impression. When music like this, so obviously pictorial, episodic and unashamedly entertaining, still delights at third hearing it is rare indeed. Even Ravel's exciting "Bolero" did not meet the third-hearing test for many a concertgoer.

Concluding with music of Tchaikovsky, the orchestra outdid itself. Unrestrained shouting followed the playing of the "Nutcracker" suite. It seemed the very soul of wit after the long-winded "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia, though there are beauties and to spare in the latter. Naturally "1812," which was consummately well played, brought a storm of applause. E. B.

Music at the Pops 'Informal'

Globe May 10

By Morris Hastings

WITH the arrival of the Pops season, Symphony Hall is once more transformed into a place of sweetmeats and light music. Small tables, occupied by patrons who partake of prohibition refreshments, have replaced the floor seats; and the balconies are filled with auditors who ask only to be soothed or stirred by melodious harmonies.

On the well-groomed shoulders of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of these concerts, falls the task of suiting the popular musical fancy. The enthusiasm at each of his brisk entrances and at the end of each crisp performance—is proof sufficient that he knows how to do just that thing extremely well.

Mr. Fiedler, in arranging his programs, has remembered that the classic symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms et al. are a "bit thick" for summer fare.

Gentler Measures

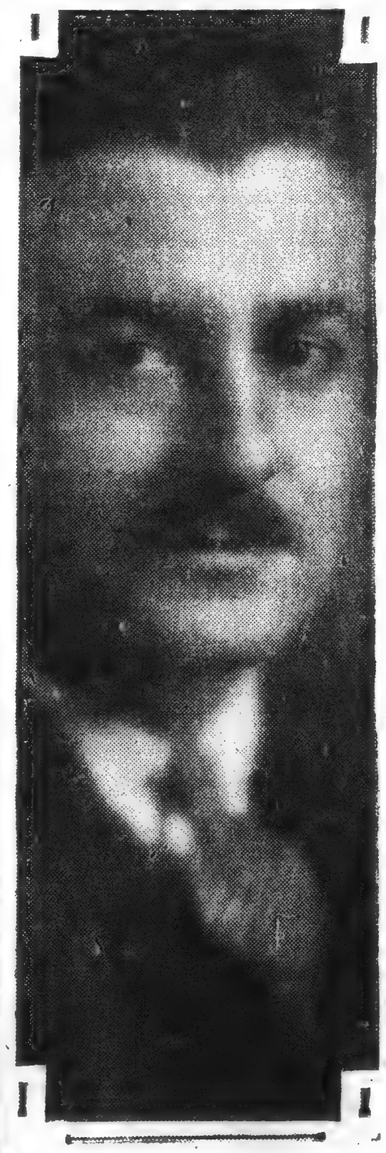
He realizes, too, that summer audiences—and, quite probably, the orchestra—shrink perceptibly, especially after a 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony, from the savage fury of a Stravinsky or Honegger.

In place of these, Fiedler substitutes a rousing Hungarian dance from the pen of Liszt or Brahms, an overture or operatic "fantasia" which we all can hum, a nipping bit from Gershwin, a suavely lilting Strauss waltz which carries our imagination to the charms of old Vienna, or a certain glowing movement from a Tschaikowsky symphony.

"The Moderns," their faces washed clean of murky incomprehensibility, do put in an occasional appearance on Fiedler's programs. There is, for example, a flashing, high-rhythmed suite from De Falla's ballet, "Love, the Sorcerer"; or Ravel's captivating "Bolero"; or that atmospheric bit of fantasy by Constant Lambert, "The Rio Grande."

To report that these pieces are well-played is to report the obvious. Fiedler has under his direction 80 men from the Boston Symphony, an organization which is hailed near and far as the most sensitive and musicianly orchestra in the world.

ARTHUR FIELDER has begun his second season as conductor of the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall.



NEW PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDY OF ARTHUR FIEDLER, who has begun his second season as leader of the Pop Concerts at Symphony hall. This first Boston-born conductor of the Pops is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, late violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and original member of the Kneisel Quartet. Arthur Fiedler conducts not only the Pops, but the Esplanade Concerts, the Museum Concerts, the Cecilia Society Chorus, and smaller orchestral groups.

(Boston Herald-Llamas, Boston)

Sunday Evening Pops

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Pops orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, gave its first Sunday evening concert of the season. The program comprised "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by Boyce (1710-1779); Londonderry Air, arranged for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty; Lambert, "The Rio Grande"; three numbers by Tchaikovsky, the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia, the "Nut-Cracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The orchestra had the able assistance of the Cecilia Society in the number by Lambert.

Standing room was at a premium in Symphony Hall last night and, as usual, Mr. Fiedler had prepared a program worthy the efforts of the band which he conducts and satisfying to those who listen. "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 is built upon a pattern similar to the overture by that name with which everyone is familiar, and, although the thematic material is interesting, the piece is hardly of stuff likely to bring it into immediate competition with its predecessor.

The Boyce miniature symphony proved a charming bit of eighteenth century writing in three movements, with a delightfully exuberant fugal ending to the third movement which emphasized the style as typical of this period.

The pièce de résistance of the evening was of course, Lambert's "Rio Grande" with Miss Marie Murray and J. M. Sanromá again in their accustomed rôles, with the Cecilia Society to lend the choral atmosphere. Since this composition has twice been reviewed in these columns within a few weeks, it seems unnecessary to comment upon the performance last night other than to say it maintained the high standard noted in previous performnaces.

Upon the Tchaikovsky group Mr. Fiedler bestowed as much care and attention to detail as though his audience were composed of subscribers to the "regular" symphony series, instead of the more informal and less-inclined-to-be-critical music lovers who comprise these Pop audiences. In all, a program which measures up in every way to those of the Sunday evenings of former seasons.

Monitor May 13 G. M. S.

For First of the "Classical" Pops

Trans May 11

WHETHER it has happened before, and when, only an older resident of this Greater Boston, or a more inveterate attendant at the Pops is in position to say. But last evening, the roving eye, seeking the dim corners of floor and galleries, found no unoccupied places, indeed witnessed ushers placing rows of chairs against the side walls, in order that all who came might sit. "Classical" Sunday Pops being a creature of the last five years, even the reviewer whose chronicling memory does not go far back of the present regime at Symphony Hall, may well conclude that last evening's crowd was unprecedented for a comparable concert.

The weather could hardly have been the reason. For the weather was forbidding. Possibly, in looking at the program, one could find a better reason; and of course, should one be lacking all other reasons, there is always the sleek and well-groomed figure of Arthur Fiedler at the conductor's stand to fall back upon. This program was termed a "British-Chaikovsky" program.—The British part was almost entirely novel. Elgar's fifth march of the "Pomp and Circumstance" series had not been heard before in Boston; Boyce's pleasant little Fifth Symphony had been heard only a few weeks ago at a concert of the MacDowell Club, but never in Symphony Hall; the Londonderry air was heard in a version of Sir Hamilton Harty rather than in the more popular, romantically over-ripe version which memory assigns to Mr. Percy Grainger; the last of the British group, also the piece de resistance of the evening, was Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" with assisting choral forces from the "Cecilia," and Mr. Sanroma and Miss Murray as piano and contralto soloists. Chaikovsky's part of this program was necessarily somewhat less novel—the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet", the ballet suite named "Nutcracker"; the overture, "1812."

The task of the composer who would write a round half-dozen pieces to a given title (as is Elgar's purported intention with him "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, is a difficult one when an early one of the series has come to be a "hit" or a "best seller." The particular "Pomp and Circumstance" march which is honored (or dishonored) by performance upon any and all occasions and in many and varied guises, indeed the only march that most people know under this name, is Number Two of the series. The one which was introduced to Boston last evening in Number Five. Presumably at some time a Number Six—last of the projected and now all but complete series—is at some not distant time to be forthcoming. The natural question anyone will certainly ask, "Is it as good as the one we know?" a reviewer would be rash to answer with an unhesitatnig affirmative. It is an excellent march, proceeding from a theme of aggressively descending intervals. There is a portion which at least begins a broad melody of the type of that middle division of Number Two which has suffered transcription beyond other parts. There are a few syncopations similar to those which are so effective in Number Two. The whole moves along in a superb rhythm. Mr. Fiedler for the most part held this rhythm strict and tight. A march was to be a march and not an orchestral tone poem. With which sensible premise one could not possibly take issue. Yet if a march is a march, Elgar is also Elgar, and Number Two taken as a tone poem with the martial idea in the background has sometimes seemed to be better exposition of Elgar than of a march. At any rate, through this marchy march of last evening one could easily imagine—for better or worse—many points at which a treatment more "espressivo" would reveal more Elgar if less march.

As at the concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the little symphony of Boyce out of the middle eighteenth century was piece of pure delight. Not alone the Bachs and the Handels had the ability to project this pleasant idiom. Not alone to minor Germans need we turn for felicitous results. A grubbing choirmaster in London church or cathedral also showed ability to turn the trick. The rolling periods unfold, the rhythms trip their light, shining way. And when all is done, neighbor nods to neighbor, with an agreeable, "That was a good one."

Sir Hamilton Harty, in his version of the so-called "Londonderry air," gives his tune first to a violin solo on a G-string, later sings it in high register for massed first violins. The first reaction is one of disappointment at the lack of those lush contrapuntal harmonies which are associated in most men's minds (oh, what an error! one would have written "in most young ladies' minds") with this expressive tune. But second thought is the better. This setting of Harty's is far more chaste, moves with more restraint and more delicacy, and best of all, gives the melody itself more of a chance. It deserves all the hearings it will receive.

Then "The Rio Grande." An additional hearing did not dim the pleasure which one took in it. And the greatest pleasure which one hearer has taken in it at every performance, is at that point where after a huge climax the solo piano enters with the cheapest of jazz chiches. Banal? Yes, of course—a dozen times over again: so banal that it could not possibly have been accident or lapse on the part of a skillful young composer. From the audience this piece of rhythms and of languors, of wild choruses and tumultous piano solos, of bold percussions and screaming brass and propulsive strings, again drew thunders of applaue. Not all "hits" continue to please after repetition. Mr. Lambert has succeeded beyond surface success.

Not a word yet about Chaikovsky. But can fresh comment possibly come out of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Nutcracker" and "1812"? One records excellences of performance, the sympathetic pointing of well-known effects, now charming, now delicious, now strong and propulsive. Mr. Fiedler and his men created the desired illusion. His audience rose to it. Seldom does "1812" fail to make its effect. Last evening was no exception. There was clapping of hands and stamping of feet, yes, and there was shouting. Is not this exactly what Chaikovsky is for in these days of the machine age? A. H. M.

At the Pops Tonight

Friends of the Home for Jewish Children have taken the whole of Symphony Hall for the Pop Concert this evening. There are no tables or seats open to the public. From Tuesday the concerts will resume the usual course.

Concert-Crier

May 16 The Pops Trans

Third Week—Seemingly Mr. Fiedler keeps his novel numbers for the fortnightly Sunday Pops. On Sunday-week, May 24, his program will include two new pieces from the young men—Mr. Tansman's orchestral version of his "Transatlantic Sonatina"; Mr. Chasins's "Parade," recently played in the Philharmonic Concerts in New York. Jazz rhythms, lightly handled, and jazz coloring, lightly laid on, haunt Mr. Tansman's memories of America. He remembers also a Negro Spiritual. As Mr. Chasins schemes his music, a procession comes and goes across the city. The listening composer hears it, more troubled by his own sombre thoughts than gladdened by the sound. To these two add Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Mr. Sanromá to play the piano-part. The first half of this Sunday program falls to Wagner with the "Siegfried Idyl" for least familiar piece. The strings and the woodwinds of the orchestra should excel in it.

Otherwise the chronicle of the third week of the Pops is briefly written. On Monday the congregation of Temple Israel has taken the whole house and the doors will be closed to the public . . . The program for Tuesday will bring back Korngold's Fantasia from the operettas and dances of Johann Strauss. Along with it the Overture to Auber's old opera, "The Black Domino." . . . On Wednesday there will be room for Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and Foulds's "Keltic Lament." . . . The new March, by Elgar and the Suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," will diversify the program on Thursday . . . The Tartar Dances from "Prince Igor," with a Minuet from Haydn's "London Symphony" as foil, are listed for Friday. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Tapley of the orchestra will play the violin-part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" and Mr. Grainger's American folk-dance, "Spoon River," are also on the bill.

POPS PROGRAM

The Pop concerts in Symphony h will give their first Saturday conc tonight, and their first Sunday co cert tomorrow.

The Sunday program will feat English music, including Lamber choral jazz piece, "The Rio Grande"; the new "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 5 of Elgar, to be heard for the first time in Boston; Harty's Londonderry Air; and the Fifth Symphony of Boyce, the 18th century composer. Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, "Nutcracker" suite, and "1812" Overture will also be played.

Tonight's program follows:

March, "Schechenyi Indulo" ..... Fahrbach
William Tell, overture ..... Rossini
Minuet from the "Clock" Symphony.. Haydn
Aida, Fantasia ..... Verdi
The Sorcerer's Apprentice, Scherzo... Dukas
Largo ..... Handel
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Nina Rosa, selection ..... Romberg
Music of the Spheres, waltz..... J. Strauss
Entrance of the Gladiators ..... Fucik

PAGE ELEVEN

RAMPAGE

Pop Concerts to Begin 4th Week

With tomorrow night's concert, the Pops in Symphony hall will enter upon the fourth week of their 46th season. Arthur Fiedler will introduce to Boston tomorrow night two notable scores: Alexander Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," in which are combined the Polish composer's fine orchestral mastery and his zest for the jazz themes of the new world, and Abram Chasins's "Parade," first played by Toscanini in New York last month with sensational success.

Monday will bring the annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The program for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

TONIGHT

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Raymonde, Overture ..... Thomas
"Rosenkavalier" Waltzes ... R. Strauss
"Spoon River," American Folk Dance ... Grainger
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ... Sibelius
"Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra ..... Lalo
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade" ... Massenet
(Baritone solo: Harry Newcombe)
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Sanford
"Our Director" ..... Bigelow

SUNDAY

Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III ... Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdamerung" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
"Sonatine Transatlantique" ..... Tansman
"Parade" ..... Chasins
"Rhapsody in Blue" ..... Gershwin
(Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma)

Record May 21

Society

Kid-Gloved Smokers Going to the Dogs Streets in Brittany

—By PETER FANEUIL

SOCIETY EN MASSE . . . sitting on little gilt chairs at green lacquered tables . . . Popping . . . some in swanky evening clothes . . . others dressed pour le sport . . . all happy and carefree . . .

MR. AND MRS. JOSEPH W. WOODS (Betty Barrell), recently returned from their Bermuda honeymoon . . . Madame wearing green, with black velvet wrap; Miss Isabella Grandin, all in black; Mrs. John R. Pos: (of Marlboro street), wearing a black wrap with white fur collar,—and arriving late; youthful Mr. and Mrs. John S. Codman (blue and white chiffon); and

Mrs. Joseph W. Woods — Mrs. Stewart Taft Beach

Miss Elizabeth Wheeler, of Chestnut Hill, (black and silver) . . .

THESE WERE BUT A FEW of the society folk who gathered at crowded Symphony Hall for the Pop Concert benefitting the Boston Tuberculosis Association . . . sponsored by Mrs. George S. Mumford, of Chestnut Hill . . . and seconded by Miss Clara Adams, Mrs. Anthony H. Brackett, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham . . . and a great many more of like persuasion . . .

Concert-Crier

The Pops

Fourth Week—Numbers from Wagner—among them "A Siegfried Idyl," of late years seldom played piece in Boston—fill the first half of the Pop Concert on Sunday evening. The young men and newer stuff divide the remainder of the list—Mr. Tansman with the orchestral version of the Foxtrot, Spiritual, Blues and Charleston that fill his "Transatlantic Sonatina"; Mr. Chasins with the brief tone-poem, "Parade"—insistent rhythm and opposed moods; Mr. Gershwin with the more familiar "Rhapsody in Blue," materially assisted by Mr. Sanromá in the piano-part. The program in detail is printed elsewhere on these pages.

On Monday, the annual "Harvard Night," Dr. Davison will lead the Glee Club through eight choruses, mostly light. . . . On Tuesday well-tested pieces fill the program. . . . On Wednesday, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" return to the active repertory. . . . On Thursday, the ticking Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; a Suite from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Lake of Swans"; Honegger's locomotive-piece, "Pacific 2-3-1," all freshen the list. . . . On Friday the young women's chorus from Lasell Seminary will be heard variously. There is room, besides, for three of Mozart's "German Dances"; Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and one of the Suites from Bizet's incidental music to the play of Southern and rustic France, "The Woman of Arles." . . . On Saturday, favorite numbers come thick into the list—among them Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody" and "that waltz" of course from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDY OF ARTHUR FIEDLER, who has begun his second season as leader of the Pop Concerts at Symphony hall. This first Boston-born conductor of the Pops is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, late violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and original member of the Kneisel Quartet. Arthur Fiedler conducts not only the Pops, but the Esplanade Concerts, the Museum Concerts, the Cecilia Society Chorus, and smaller orchestral groups.

(Boston Herald-Llamas, Boston)

Sunday Evening Pops

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Pops orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, gave its first Sunday evening concert of the season. The program comprised "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by Boyce (1710-1779); Londonderry Air, arranged for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty; Lambert, "The Rio Grande"; three numbers by Tchaikovsky, the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia, the "Nut-Cracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The orchestra had the able assistance of the Cecilia Society in the number by Lambert.

Standing room was at a premium in Symphony Hall last night and, as usual, Mr. Fiedler had prepared a program worthy the efforts of the band which he conducts and satisfying to those who listen. "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 is built upon a pattern similar to the overture by that name with which everyone is familiar, and, although the thematic material is interesting, the piece is hardly of stuff likely to bring it into immediate competition with its predecessor.

The Boyce miniature symphony proved a charming bit of eighteenth century writing in three movements, with a delightfully exuberant fugal ending to the third movement which emphasized the style as typical of this period.

The pièce de résistance of the evening was of course, Lambert's "Rio Grande" with Miss Marie Murray and J. M. Sanromá again in their accustomed rôles, with the Cecilia Society to lend the choral atmosphere. Since this composition has twice been reviewed in these columns within a few weeks, it seems unnecessary to comment upon the performance last night other than to say it maintained the high standard noted in previous performnaces.

Upon the Tchaikovsky group Mr. Fiedler bestowed as much care and attention to detail as though his audience were composed of subscribers to the "regular" symphony series, instead of the more informal and less-inclined-to-be-critical music lovers who comprise these Pop audiences. In all, a program which measures up in every way to those of the Sunday evenings of former seasons.

Monitor May 11 G. M. S.

For First of the "Classical" Pops

Trans May 11

WHETHER it has happened before, and when, only an older resident of this Greater Boston, or a more inveterate attendant at the Pops is in position to say. But last evening, the roving eye, seeking the dim corners of floor and galleries, found no unoccupied places, indeed witnessed ushers placing rows of chairs against the side walls, in order that all who came might sit. "Classical" Sunday Pops being a creature of the last five years, even the reviewer whose chronicling memory does not go far back of the present regime at Symphony Hall, may well conclude that last evening's crowd was unprecedented for a comparable concert.

The weather could hardly have been the reason. For the weather was forbidding. Possibly, in looking at the program, one could find a better reason; and of course, should one be lacking all other reasons, there is always the sleek and well-groomed figure of Arthur Fiedler at the conductor's stand to fall back upon. This program was termed a "British-Chaikovsky" program.—The British part was almost entirely novel. Elgar's fifth march of the "Pomp and Circumstance" series had not been heard before in Boston; Boyce's pleasant little Fifth Symphony had been heard only a few weeks ago at a concert of the MacDowell Club, but never in Symphony Hall; the Londonderry air was heard in a version of Sir Hamilton Harty rather than in the more popular, romantically over-ripe version which memory assigns to Mr. Percy Grainger; the last of the British group, also the piece de resistance of the evening, was Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" with assisting choral forces from the "Cecilia," and Mr. Sanroma and Miss Murray as piano and contralto soloists. Chaikovsky's part of this program was necessarily somewhat less novel—the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet", the ballet suite named "Nutcracker"; the overture, "1812."

The task of the composer who would write a round half-dozen pieces to a given title (as is Elgar's purported intention with him "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, is a difficult one when an early one of the series has come to be a "hit" or a "best seller." The particular "Pomp and Circumstance" march which is honored (or dishonored) by performance upon any and all occasions and in many and varied guises, indeed the only march that most people know under this name, is Number Two of the series. The one which was introduced to Boston last evening in Number Five. Presumably at some time a Number Six—last of the projected and now all but complete series—is at some not distant time to be forthcoming. The natural question anyone will certainly ask, "Is it as good as the one we know?" a reviewer would be rash to answer with an unhesitatnig affirmative. It is an excellent march, proceeding from a theme of aggressively descending intervals. There is a portion which at least begins a broad melody of the type of that middle division of Number Two which has suffered transcription beyond other parts. There are a few syncopations similar to those which are so effective in Number Two. The whole moves along in a superb rhythm. Mr. Fiedler for the most part held this rhythm strict and tight. A march was to be a march and not an orchestral tone poem. With which sensible premise one could not possibly take issue. Yet if a march is a march, Elgar is also Elgar, and Number Two taken as a tone poem with the martial idea in the background has sometimes seemed to be better exposition of Elgar than of a march. At any rate, through this marchy march of last evening one could easily imagine—for better or worse—many points at which a treatment more "espressivo" would reveal more Elgar if less march.

As at the concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the little symphony of Boyce out of the middle eighteenth century was piece of pure delight. Not alone the Bachs and the Handels had the ability to project this pleasant idiom. Not alone to minor Germans need we turn for felicitous results. A grubbing choirmaster in London church or cathedral also showed ability to turn the trick. The rolling periods unfold, the rhythms trip their light, shining way. And when all is done, neighbor nods to neighbor, with an agreeable, "That was a good one."

Sir Hamilton Harty, in his version of the so-called "Londonderry air," gives his tune first to a violin solo on a G-string, later sings it in high register for massed first violins. The first reaction is one of disappointment at the lack of those lush contrapuntal harmonies which are associated in most men's minds (oh, what an error! one would have written "in most young ladies' minds") with this expressive tune. But second thought is the better. This setting of Harty's is far more chaste, moves with more restraint and more delicacy, and best of all, gives the melody itself more of a chance. It deserves all the hearings it will receive.

Then "The Rio Grande." An additional hearing did not dim the pleasure which one took in it. And the greatest pleasure which one hearer has taken in it at every performance, is at that point where after a huge climax the solo piano enters with the cheapest of jazz chiches. Banal? Yes, of course—a dozen times over again: so banal that it could not possibly have been accident or lapse on the part of a skillful young composer. From the audience this piece of rhythms and of languors, of wild choruses and tumultous piano solos, of bold percussions and screaming brass and propulsive strings, again drew thunders of applaue. Not all "hits" continue to please after repetition. Mr. Lambert has succeeded beyond surface success.

Not a word yet about Chaikovsky. But can fresh comment possibly come out of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Nutcracker" and "1812"? One records excellences of performance, the sympathetic pointing of well-known effects, now charming, now delicious, now strong and propulsive. Mr. Fiedler and his men created the desired illusion. His audience rose to it. Seldom does "1812" fail to make its effect. Last evening was no exception. There was clapping of hands and stamping of feet, yes, and there was shouting. Is not this exactly what Chaikovsky is for in these days of the machine age? A. H. M.

At the Pops Tonight

Friends of the Home for Jewish Children have taken the whole of Symphony Hall for the Pop Concert this evening. There are no tables or seats open to the public. From Tuesday the concerts will resume the usual course.

Concert-Crier

May 16 The Pops Trans

Third Week—Seemingly Mr. Fiedler keeps his novel numbers for the fortnightly Sunday Pops. On Sunday-week, May 24, his program will include two new pieces from the young men—Mr. Tansman's orchestral version of his "Transatlantic Sonatina"; Mr. Chasins's "Parade," recently played in the Philharmonic Concerts in New York. Jazz rhythms, lightly handled, and jazz coloring, lightly laid on, haunt Mr. Tansman's memories of America. He remembers also a Negro Spiritual. As Mr. Chasins schemes his music, a procession comes and goes across the city. The listening composer hears it, more troubled by his own sombre thoughts than gladdened by the sound. To these two add Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Mr. Sanromá to play the piano-part. The first half of this Sunday program falls to Wagner with the "Siegfried Idyl" for least familiar piece. The strings and the woodwinds of the orchestra should excel in it.

Otherwise the chronicle of the third week of the Pops is briefly written. On Monday the congregation of Temple Israel has taken the whole house and the doors will be closed to the public . . . The program for Tuesday will bring back Korngold's Fantasia from the operettas and dances of Johann Strauss. Along with it the Overture to Auber's old opera, "The Black Domino." . . . On Wednesday there will be room for Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and Foulds's "Keltic Lament." . . . The new March, by Elgar and the Suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," will diversify the program on Thursday . . . The Tartar Dances from "Prince Igor," with a Minuet from Haydn's "London Symphony" as foil, are listed for Friday. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Tapley of the orchestra will play the violin-part in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" and Mr. Grainger's American folk-dance, "Spoon River," are also on the bill.

POPS PROGRAM

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will give their first Saturday concert tonight, and their first Sunday concert tomorrow.

The Sunday program will feature English music, including Lambert's choral jazz piece, "The Rio Grande"; the new "Pomp and Circumstance" March No. 5 of Elgar, to be heard for the first time in Boston; Harty's Londonderry Air; and the Fifth Symphony of Boyce, the 18th century composer. Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, "Nutcracker" suite, and "1812" Overture will also be played.

Tonight's program follows:

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
"Raymonde," Overture ..... Thomas
"Rosenkavalier," Walizes ..... R. Strauss
"Spoon River," American Folk Dance ..... Grainger
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ..... Sibelius
"Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra ..... Lalo
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade" ..... Massenet
(Baritone solo: Harry Newcombe)
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Sanford
"Our Director" ..... Bigelow

SUNDAY

Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III. Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdamerung" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
"Sonatine Transatlantique" ..... Tansman
"Parade" ..... Chasins
"Rhapsody in Blue" ..... Gershwin
(Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma)

RAMPAGE

Pop Concerts to Begin 4th Week

With tomorrow night's concert, the Pops in Symphony hall will enter upon the fourth week of their 46th season. Arthur Fiedler will introduce to Boston tomorrow night two notable scores: Alexander Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," in which are combined the Polish composer's fine orchestral mastery and his zest for the jazz themes of the new world, and Abram Chasins's "Parade," first played by Toscanini in New York last month with sensational success.

Monday will bring the annual Harvard night, with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club.

The program for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

TONIGHT

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
"Raymonde," Overture ..... Thomas
"Rosenkavalier," Walizes ..... R. Strauss
"Spoon River," American Folk Dance ..... Grainger
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ..... Sibelius
"Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra ..... Lalo
The Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade" ..... Massenet
(Baritone solo: Harry Newcombe)
Victor Herbert Favorites ..... Sanford
"Our Director" ..... Bigelow

SUNDAY

Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III. Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdamerung" ..... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
"Sonatine Transatlantique" ..... Tansman
"Parade" ..... Chasins
"Rhapsody in Blue" ..... Gershwin
(Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma)

22 Record May 2

Society

Kid-Gloved Smokers Going to the Dogs Streets in Brittany

—By PETER FANEUIL

SOCIETY EN MASSE . . . sitting on little gilt chairs at green lacquered tables . . . Popping . . . some in swanky evening clothes . . . others dressed pour le sport . . . all happy and carefree . . .

MR. AND MRS. JOSEPH W. WOODS (Betty Barrell), recently returned from their Bermuda honeymoon . . . Madame wearing green, with black velvet wrap; Miss Isabella Grandin, all in black; Mrs. John R. Post (of Marlboro street), wearing a black wrap with white fur collar,—and arriving late; youthful Mr. and Mrs. John S. Codman (blue and white chiffon); and

Mrs. Joseph W. Woods — Mrs. Stewart Taft Beach

Elizabeth Wheeler, of Chest- Hill, (black and silver) . . .

SE WERE BUT A FEW of iety folk who gathered at Symphony Hall for the ert benefitting the Bos- culosis Association . . . Mrs. George S. Mum- tnut Hill . . . and sec- s Clara Adams, Mrs. . Brackett, Mrs. Louis rothingham . . . and a great many more of like persuasion . . .

Concert-Crier

The Pops

Fourth Week—Numbers from Wagner—among them "A Siegfried Idyl," of late years seldom played piece in Boston—fill the first half of the Pop Concert on Sunday evening. The young men and newer stuff divide the remainder of the list—Mr. Tansman with the orchestral version of the Foxtrot, Spiritual, Blues and Charleston that fill his "Transatlantic Sonatina"; Mr. Chasins with the brief tone-poem, "Parade"—insistent rhythm and opposed moods; Mr. Gershwin with the more familiar "Rhapsody in Blue," materially assisted by Mr. Sanromá in the piano-part. The program in detail is printed elsewhere on these pages.

On Monday, the annual "Harvard Night," Dr. Davison will lead the Glee Club through eight choruses, mostly light. . . . On Tuesday well-tested pieces fill the program. . . . On Wednesday, Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," and Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" return to the active repertory. . . . On Thursday, the ticking Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; a Suite from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Lake of Swans"; Honegger's locomotive-piece, "Pacific 2-3-1," all freshen the list. . . . On Friday the young women's chorus from Lasell Seminary will be heard variously. There is room, besides, for three of Mozart's "German Dances"; Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, and one of the Suites from Bizet's incidental music to the play of Southern and rustic France, "The Woman of Arles." . . . On Saturday, favorite numbers come thick into the list—among them Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody" and "that waltz"—of course from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time."

224

Concert Chronicle

Enter Mr. Chasins

ONCE and again in pianists' recitals, Bostonians have come upon pieces by Abram Chasins—in the smaller forms, written virtuoso-fashion, flavored agreeably with wit and fancy. They were the work of a young American, New-York-born and bred, now at the end of his twenties, busy with teaching in the Curtis Institute at Philadelphia. Next Sunday evening in the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chasins will be heard as composer for orchestra. The piece is named "Parade"; in form a compact symphonic poem; in substance a contrast of opposed moods. It was first played last month at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York under Mr. Toscanini. It reflects, according to the composer, his reaction to a parade—"that reaction being an instinctive mob-fear." To me, adds Mr. Chasins, "as to many others, a parade has never been an exhilarating spectacle but rather a depressing one." According to a more rhetorical annotator, "Behind the banners and the shining brass, Chasins remembers spilled blood; underneath the ruthless trampling, he hears the silence of unfruitful death. . . . The parade becomes a monstrous rout, destroying itself, leaving only a tuneless echo, straggling into silence."

"The contrast implied in these sayings," wrote Mr. Perkins when he was reviewing the piece for the Herald Tribune, "has a certain semblance to that of the March Movement in Chaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony.' Mr. Chasins's music offers a march tune against a background of dissimilar hue and atmosphere, relatively somber, giving a sense of foreboding, heightened by the persistent rhythm. Descriptively, the work is successful, although, despite its brevity, it does not altogether avoid an impression of repetitiousness, or indicate whether the composer might be equally successful in a work of more extended character. The effectiveness of 'Parade' lies mainly in the emphasized contrast of simultaneously set-forth moods and color."

Mr. Henderson, listening for The Sun, wrote with cool detachment: "We are asked to hear not merely the march of troops but also an expression of man's fear in the presence of destructive forces. We heard the parade, and, equipped with the necessary information, some hint also of rather important goings-on behind the procession of soldiers. But the composition did not seem as tragic as we were told it was. It was a commendable piece of orchestral writing in which the thematic material had the advantage of being well seasoned."

Incidents and Prospects

The Harvard Glee Club, with Dr. Davison conducting, will sing eight numbers at the Pop Concert next Monday evening: ancient pieces from Bach and de Lassus; an old madrigal from Marenzio; choruses from "Pinafore," "Boris Godunov" and Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad"; a Scottish folk-song.

Later in the week, Mr. Fiedler will freshen the Pop programs with Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "The Lake of Swans"; three "German Dances" from Mozart; Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"; numbers from Gershwin and Elgar.

Music This W

Adhering to the rule that the Sunday evening Pop Concerts should be symphonic in character, Mr. Fiedler has made for that of this evening a programme the first half of which includes four pieces by Wagner: the Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," Siegfried's Rhine-Journey and the Overture to "Tannhauser"; while the second half embraces three contemporary compositions. The first of these modern items, Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," is an orchestral arrangement of the amusing essay in the American jazz and spiritual idioms made known to us last season in the piano recitals of Mr. Iturbi and Mr. Gieseking. The second, Chasins' "Parade," a piece from the hand of a rising young New Yorker, is a tone-poem which stresses not the surface pomps of a parade but the potential violence which lies beneath the surface. Mr. Toscanini introduced the work to New York last season. The final number, Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," is familiar, and as in previous performances at the Pop Concerts Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist.

During the rest of the week the Pop Concerts will conform to the older tradition which blends light and agreeably serious music on the same programme. Monday evening brings the annual Harvard Night, with incidental songs by the Glee Club. Tuesday's programme ranges from Cadman's "At Dawning" to the "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner. On Wednesday Mr. Fiedler found place for Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture as well as for a medley of favorite numbers from the operettas of Victor Herbert.

On Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler will venture the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Honegger's Pacific 2-3-1 and Dvorak's "Humoresque" also have place on this list. Friday evening the chorus of Lasell Seminary will sing, and the orchestral pieces range all the way from Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band" to the third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven. Patriotic pieces, including Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and Meacham's "American Patrol," together with such popular compositions as Handel's Largo and the "Light Cavalry" Overture of Suppe make the holiday programme for Saturday evening.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Second Sunday Pop Concert

Mr Fiedler continued, at the second Sunday Pop concert last evening, his admirable policy of presenting at these Sunday concerts music previously unheard in Boston. The pieces of especial interest were Abram Chasins' "Parade" and an orchestral version of Alexander Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique." In the interest of correctness in factual details, however, it should be said that the "Sonatine" was not a total stranger in Symphony Hall, for Mr Iturbi played excerpts from it on the piano last Winter. The remainder of the program was devoted to excerpts from some of Wagner's music dramas and to George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist.

The "Sonatine" is light music, a European attempt at using jazz. Mr Tansman probably has been about as successful in this endeavor as many another European who essays this musical idiom. Whatever its faults and banalities, American jazz is not without its own particular difficulties. It is not a system of writing squashy tunes and equally squashy harmonies that may be picked up by any composer. Jazz is indigenous to this country, and, from all appearances, exceedingly difficult if not impossible of imitation by composers of other nationalities.

The "Sonatine" has three "movements," Foxtrot, Spiritual and Blues, and Charleston. The latter is by all odds the best, in thematic material, harmony, setting of melody to rhythm and in orchestration.

Gershwin's ever-welcome "Rhapsody" offers a striking, if odious, comparison. Granted there are banalities even in this piece, it nevertheless has a warmth of spirit, a freshness and a sincerity that mark it as good music. The thematic material is of great worth of its kind, and the construction of the composition is closely knit and well planned.

Some have it that jazz is a nightmare in the life of music. But when a Gershwin can write such a "Rhapsody," however, it doees not seem exravagant to say that jazz is not a chaos of muted trumpets, crooning saxophones and broken rhythms, but a definitely important phase in the process of musical evolution.

Mr Chasins' "Parade" was intended to be a musical incarnation of the composer's aversion to parades and the hysterical mob force they represent to him. Neither in thematic material nor in emotional intensity did he succeed in conveying to one listened an iota of his personal feeling. "Parade" was notable, chiefly, for orchestral technique that stamped the composer as a musician of talent and promise in that respect.

Mr Sanroma, who was applauded vociferously, left, as usual, nothing to be desired in his performance.

Mr Fiedler deserved thanks for obtaining from his men an approximation of genuine jazz rhythm. No other, apparently, can do it. In the Wagner music, he strove for general outline, and impressed chiefly with his broad and forceful interpretations. The wealth of instrumental detail in the "Siegfried Idyll," however, was excellently brought forth, with delicacy and clarity.

momentary feeling that the ubiquitous "Bolero" was stalking among the players; witness the patter of a gentle drum roll which continued, at intersals throughout the piece. Yet the similarity soon ceased, and "Parade" became none other than its quite charming self—a rhythmic piece of writing for modern orchestra, which apparently was well liked by the audience. The piece deserves a second hearing.

To Gershwin's well-worn "Rhapsody" went applausive honors last night. Perhaps one may qualify, and say that honors were even between the "Rhapsody" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Certainly one may not overlook the shouts of approval which greeted orchestra, conductor and the modest Mr. Sanromá upon the conclusion of the perfromance, nor may one overlook the fact that this piece continues to please where Mr. Gershwin's later works receive but a modicum of attention. Satisfied, happy, another Sunday evening audience thanked Mr. Fiedler for an hour and a half of excellent entertainment.

G. M. S.

Monitor Music

Sunday Pops Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall, the second of the Sunday evening Pop concerts was given. As on the opening Sunday night two weeks ago, the house was "sold out," with extra chairs again being set against the side walls. Mr. Fiedler again succeeded in pleasing all tastes. He devoted the first half of his program to works of Wagner, including the Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," an excerpt from "Götterdämmerung" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser." There followed Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," a first orchestral performance in Boston, "Parade" by Chasins, for the first time to a Boston audience, and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with the competent Mr. Sanromá as soloist.

With more than ordinary warmth did the audience applaud the Wagnerian music. Mr. Fiedler and his band gave many moments of genuine pleasure to those who frequent the hall during the "regular" season, and it is a matter for comment that the men are able to infuse their performances with what appears to be the most spontaneous enthusiasm.

Of course, interest centered in the Tansman and Chasins numbers. It must be an intrepid pianist indeed who will now present a piano arrangement of the "Sonatine Transatlantique." With the orchestral diversifications attainable and tonal color made possible through the use of a modern orchestra, a mere one-man piano will sound tame enough. With opportunity for cool comparison, one turns thumbs down on any but the orchestral version from this time forth. And yet, singularly enough, despite its modern rhythms, its use of the wailing saxophone (excellently played, by the way), its trick percussion and so on, the audience remained but politely enthusiastic over it. Wagner, so far, had received by far the majority of votes.

With the opening measures of the "Parade" by Chasins, one had a momentary feeling that the ubiquitous "Bolero" was stalking among the players; witness the patter of a gentle drum roll which continued, at intersals throughout the piece. Yet the similarity soon ceased, and "Parade" became none other than its quite charming self—a rhythmic piece of writing for modern orchestra, which apparently was well liked by the audience. The piece deserves a second hearing.

To Gershwin's well-worn "Rhapsody" went applausive honors last night. Perhaps one may qualify, and say that honors were even between the "Rhapsody" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Certainly one may not overlook the shouts of approval which greeted orchestra, conductor and the modest Mr. Sanromá upon the conclusion of the perfromance, nor may one overlook the fact that this piece continues to please where Mr. Gershwin's later works receive but a modicum of attention. Satisfied, happy, another Sunday evening audience thanked Mr. Fiedler for an hour and a half of excellent entertainment.

G. M. S.

Younger Men And a Revival From Wagner

The Law, the 'Siegfried Idyl,' Jazz, Chasins, Sanroma, All at a Sunday Pop

REASONABLY, Symphony Hall intends that the public of the Sunday Pops, which now fills every seat and overflows into the standing-room, shall know where the blame falls. Conspicuously on the program last evening stood this admonition:

Refreshments of any kind shall not be offered for sale and no smoking shall be permitted in a the-

BOSTON EVENING AMERICAN——Lar

T PARK

Stirring Dra Adventure

Pianist, Critic Reverse Roles

Jesus Maria Sanroma, brilliant Boston pianist, internationally known, writes, at the request of the Evening American, a review of the concert in which Moses Smith, music critic of the American, and Nathan Rosen, local pianist, appeared yesterday afternoon at the Fine Arts Theater. In the evening critic and pianist returned to their normal roles, when Sanroma played as soloist at the Pop concert.

By JESUS MARIA SANROMA

Moses Smith and Nathan Rosen, in their half hour of two-piano music at the Fine Arts Theater yesterday, played a program consisting of the Mozart Sonata in D major, the Romance from Arensky's Suite, Opus 15, and Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre." This represented an excellent selection, so far as that could be done in a brief list, for it included a really great work of Mozart; not often heard, and a work at least charming, if no more, from Arensky. Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" is too well known, at least in its orchestral form, to need recommendation.

Of this program the Andante from the Mozart Sonata and the Romance of Arensky fared best. A very noticeable nervousness on the part of Mr. Rose threw the ensemble out of order in the opening allegro of Mozart and in the "Danse Macabre." On the other hand, Mr. Smith, more possessed of his powers, gave a more musical understanding and technical performance of his part than his partner. Thus there was the rather ironic situation of a pianist, in his accustomed place, being ill at ease, while a critic, in a strange place, played without obvious discomfort.

Their happy choice of tempi, and adherence to them, were a tribute to their musicianship as a two-piano ensemble. To this listener, furthermore, it was a pleasure to discover the many performing abilities of Mr. Smith, whose professional work is primarily that of a critic.

By MOSES SMITH

Arthur Fiedler led the Pops Orchestra last night in a remarkable concert. Half of the unusual program was devoted to excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas, while the other half, consisting of modern music, had two novelties. One of these was the "Sonatine Transalatique" of Tanque, heard previously here in its original piano form, but never before in the newer orchestral version. The redressing was tastefully done, with suitable jazz orchestration. The music is light, pleasing and ephemeral. Similarly, Chasins' "Parade," played last night for the first time in Boston.

I will dismiss the playing of the Wagner music, some of which was excellently performed, with a mere nod for the place of honor goes to Jesus Maria Sanroma—because of his brilliant playing of the piano part in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and also because, for the day at least, he is a next-column neighbor of mine. When I say that Sanroma gave a stunning performance of his part I am supported by the shouts of the audience at the close. Nor have I the same reason for being discreetly tactful towards him as he has towards me. I have praised him in the past for his brilliant musicianship, his artistic modesty and sincerity. Last night there was a new element—virtuosity, the dazzle and fire that somehow I have missed in his previous performances.

P. S.—Sanroma hit one wrong key, left out several, and put in a few extra. At least, he says so.

Pops

Mr. Fiedler had little time to rehearse what for most of the players may have been an unfamiliar piece. Nor in this stage of his progress as conductor is he to be reproached with a performance that at moments might have been more sensitive, plastic and euphonious. Enough that the hungry ear heard anew the "Siegfried Idyl"; while answering imagination sufficed for outer gloss and inner implication. Before the listener passed a music in which Wagner shuts himself within narrow confines because, so doing, he may more felicitously express himself and gain his end. Within them, a super-sensitive variety of texture is woven into a persistent loveliness; an adroitly changeful flow sustains a pervasive mood; a few colors are brightened or darkened, blended or contrasted, refinement upon refinement, until the whole becomes a sublimated magic upon the enfolded senses. The "Siegfried Idyl" upsprings from the motivs of the hero whose name the new-born son and this, his music, shall bear. Yet Wagner so mutes and transmutes them, so stays his instinctive richness and flood, that it sounds with quiet gladness, still affection, tender longing and visioning, a blest happiness and peace.

A single note, a passing phrase, the lightest modulation, inflection, shading, and we listeners are stirred. As there is no more sensitive, so there is no finer-fingered Wagner. He is writing most intimately, yet the benediction of the "Siegfried Idyl" falls upon all the fathers and all the mothers who may stand dreaming in happy content beside the cradles of their sons. It is his moment of surcease from the theater, from his epics and tragedies in words and tones. Tone-poet he cannot help but be; yet this time "from the heart to the heart" as Beethoven had it on a very different occasion. Some of us take leave to think the lyric pages of "Die Meistersinger" the rarest music in beauty that man has yet written. In that very house Wagner had finished them. Now into the "Siegfried Idyl" he distilled their quintessence. . . . Mr. Fiedler went on to the heroical sweep and sound of the other Siegfried's "Rhine Journey"; then to the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the only proclamation of triumphant virtue of which mind and spirit seldom weary. Yet above these sonorities lingered the "Siegfried Idyl," soft and bright and vaporous.

After Wagner the young men. First Mr. Tansman, fresh, as it were, from his sojourn in the United States a year and more ago. Then and there, following the custom of European composers, he listened to much jazz. He also has an absorbent temperament—whether for Polish folk-songs or American Blues. Consequently composition at leisure in Paris, to wit, a "Transatlantic Sonatina" in two versions: One, for piano, played by Mr. Gieseking in Symphony Hall last winter, another, for orchestra with conspicuous piano and saxophone parts, now played for the first time hereabouts. A Foxtrot, with a sentimentalized middle section, gives Mr. Tansman a first movement; a Spiritual and a Blues provide him with a slow division and a scherzo-like intermezzo; a Charleston spares not in vehemently rhythmic close. Mr. Tansman's adaptation of a highly orthodox form to highly unorthodox content is amusing to connoisseurs. Once more the young gentleman from Poland-Paris has all the facilities.

The casual hearer will be more impressed with the American quality of the jazz. Unlike most Europeans, Mr. Tansman neither thins, dulls, nor refines upon it. The celebrated Krenék of "Jonny spielt auf" wrote pale stuff at third hand. Ravel wound sophisticated strands, jazz-spun, into sophisticated chamber music. Lambert infuses jazz-like inflections and coloring into an idiom of his own. Mr. Tansman, above all the others, expropriates the real thing. His Foxtrot, even to the virtuoso-ingenuities for various instruments, is a Foxtrot naked to the ear. His Charleston flings about to the satisfaction of all beholders. If his Spiritual does not go very deep, it has the right shape and color; while with the Blues he is sure and sounding again. One of Mr. Whiteman's bandsmen used to play, at need, through a hard hat. Mr. Tansman without a moment's hesitation, claps it on Euterpe's head.

Next Mr. Abram Chasins and "Parade"—the piece in which Mr. Toscanini, as the saying went in New York, "discovered America." There have been more exciting discoveries; while the composer's anxious friends might have hung less literary baggage about his neck. Mr. Chasins hears a passing procession; hears it advancing and receding; hears it also in sustained and broken rhythms. The sound stirs in him anxieties, resentments, alarms, inasmuch as parades depress him and rouse his dread of mob-spirit. Now in the underbody, now on the surface, he would impart this mood. In degree, with reciprocal labor on the part of the listening imagination, he succeeds. Parade and sensations dwindle away and a compact, neatly made, workaday tone-poem, mostly of the common stock, is at end. Well enough on a Pop Sunday; but the "maestro illustrissimo" might advisedly broaden his explorations of the music of this land.

Last, Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" as fresh, though by no means so surprising, as when it emerged seven years ago. There are good tunes in it as the slow section, with Russian flavors, still witnesses. There are pianistic and orchestral acrobatics, intrinsically jazz-like, as the finale over-abundantly testifies. There is, above all, a first section that sounds to this day like no music the listener has heard before or since—Mr. Gershwin releasing the jazz that long had been second nature to him, then discovering, con amore and con fuoco, that he could give it musical form, substance, seemliness and effect.

There were also for this particular occasion, as for Mr. Tansman's Sonatina, Mr. Tapley who is expert saxophonist, and Mr. Sanromá who played the piano-part with a Gershwinian boldness and fervor, sonority and rhythmical energy, with a more than Gershwinian mastery of means to ends. From his hands the sheer beat and plangency carried all before them. Mr. Fiedler can spur any jazzy piece; while as everyone knows—for blame or for praise—the Bostonians can be the jazziest of symphony orchestras. To Mr. Gruenberg and to Mr. Carpenter, as now to Mr. Gershwin, they have given proof. At the end, clapping, shouting and through the happy tumult Mr. Sanromá in and out. What say, Mr. Chasins or even Mr. Tansman?

H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

There is a possibility that Sir Hamilton Harty, the noted conductor of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester, in England, will be heard at Symphony Hall before The Pope are at an end. The management of the Boston Orchestra has invited him to be guest-conductor on a Sunday evening, should the time of his arrival in New York and his engagements in Los Angeles and San Francisco permit him to do so.

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard College

March, "Veritas" ..... Densmore
Overture to the Hindu Play, "Sakountala" ..... Goldmark
Tales from Johann Strauss ... Korngold
Choral Numbers:
My Spirit be Joyful ..... Bach
Inimici autem ..... Lassus
Spring Returns ..... Morenzio
Chorus from "Pinafore" .. Sullivan
Suite from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer" ..... de Falla
Overture, "The Year 1812" .. Chaikovsky
Choral Numbers:
Salamaleikum ..... Cornelius
The Hundred Pipers, Scotch Folk-Song
Coronation Scene from "Boris," Mussorgsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "Girl Crazy" ..... Gershwin
Tango, "Jalousie" ..... Gade
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse

Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

Conductors:
A. Fiedler — A. T. Davison

224

Concert Chronicle

Enter Mr. Chasins

ONCE and again in pianists' recitals, Bostonians have come upon pieces by Abram Chasins—in the smaller forms, written virtuoso-fashion, flavored agreeably with wit and fancy. They were the work of a young American, New-York-born and bred, now at the end of his twenties, busy with teaching in the Curtis Institute at Philadelphia. Next Sunday evening in the Pop Concert at Symphony Hall, Mr. Chasins will be heard as composer for orchestra. The piece is named "Parade"; in form a compact symphonic poem; in substance a contrast of opposed moods. It was first played last month at the Philharmonic Concerts in New York under Mr. Toscanini. It reflects, according to the composer, his reaction to a parade—"that reaction being an instinctive mob-fear." To me, adds Mr. Chasins, "as to many others, a parade has never been an exhilarating spectacle but rather a depressing one." According to a more rhetorical annotator, "Behind the banners and the shining brass, Chasins remembers spilled blood; underneath the ruthless trampling, he hears the silence of unfruitful death. . . . The parade becomes a monstrous rout, destroying itself, leaving only a tuneless echo, straggling into silence."

"The contrast implied in these savings," wrote Mr. Perkins when he was reviewing the piece for the Herald Tribune, "has a certain semblance to that of the March Movement in Chaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony.' Mr. Chasins's music offers a march tune against a background of dissimilar hue and atmosphere, relatively somber, giving a sense of foreboding, heightened by the persistent rhythm. Descriptively, the work is successful, although, despite its brevity, it does not altogether avoid an impression of repetitiousness, or indicate whether the composer might be equally successful in a work of more extended character. The effectiveness of 'Parade' lies mainly in the emphasized contrast of simultaneously set-forth moods and color."

Mr. Henderson, listening for The Sun, wrote with cool detachment: "We are asked to hear not merely the march of troops but also an expression of man's fear in the presence of destructive forces. We heard the parade, and, equipped with the necessary information, some hint also of rather important goings-on behind the procession of soldiers. But the composition did not seem as tragic as we were told it was. It was a commendable piece of orchestral writing in which the thematic material had the advantage of being well seasoned."

Incidents and Prospects

The Harvard Glee Club, with Dr. Davison conducting, will sing eight numbers at the Pop Concert next Monday evening: ancient pieces from Bach and de Lassus; an old madrigal from Marenzio; choruses from "Pinafore," "Boris Godunov" and Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad"; a Scottish folk-song.

Later in the week, Mr. Fiedler will freshen the Pop programs with Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; dances from Chaikovsy's ballet, "The Lake of Swans"; three "German Dances" from Mozart; Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"; numbers from Gershwin and Elgar.

Music This W

Adhering to the rule that the Sunday evening Pop Concerts should be symphonic in character, Mr. Fiedler has made for that of this evening a programme the first half of which includes four pieces by Wagner: the Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," Siegfried's Rhine-Journey and the Overture to "Tannhauser"; while the second half embraces three contemporary compositions. The first of these modern items, Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," is an orchestral arrangement of the amusing essay in the American jazz and spiritual idioms made known to us last season in the piano recitals of Mr. Iturbi and Mr. Gieseking. The second, Chasins' "Parade," a piece from the hand of a rising young New Yorker, is a tone-poem which stresses not the surface pomps of a parade but the potential violence which lies beneath the surface. Mr. Toscanini introduced the work to New York last season. The final number, Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," is familiar, and as in previous performances at the Pop Concerts Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist.

During the rest of the week the Pop Concerts will conform to the older tradition which blends light and agreeably serious music on the same programme. Monday evening brings the annual Harvard Night, with incidental songs by the Glee Club. Tuesday's programme ranges from Cadman's "At Dawning" to the "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner. On Wednesday Mr. Fiedler found place for Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture as well as for a medley of favorite numbers from the operettas of Victor Herbert.

On Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler will venture the Allegretto Scherzando from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Honegger's Pacific 2-3-1 and Dvorak's "Humoresque" also have place on this list. Friday evening the chorus of Lasell Seminary will sing, and the orchestral pieces range all the way from Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band" to the third "Leonora" Overture of Beethoven. Patriotic pieces, including Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and Meacham's "American Patrol," together with such popular compositions as Handel's Largo and the "Light Cavalry" Overture of Suppe make the holiday programme for Saturday evening.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Second Sunday Pop Concert

Mr Fiedler continued, at the second Sunday Pop concert last evening, his admirable policy of presenting at these Sunday concerts music previously unheard in Boston. The pieces of especial interest were Abram Chasins' "Parade" and an orchestral version of Alexander Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique." In the interest of correctness in factual details, however, it should be said that the "Sonatine" was not a total stranger in Symphony Hall, for Mr Iturbi played excerpts from it on the piano last Winter. The remainder of the program was devoted to excerpts from some of Wagner's music dramas and to George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist.

The "Sonatine" is light music, a European attempt at using jazz. Mr Tansman probably has been about as successful in this endeavor as many another European who essays this musical idiom. Whatever its faults and banalities, American jazz is not without its own particular difficulties. It is not a system of writing squashy tunes and equally squashy harmonies that may be picked up by any composer. Jazz is indigenous to this country, and, from all appearances, exceedingly difficult if not impossible of imitation by composers of other nationalities.

The "Sonatine" has three "movements," Foxtrot, Spiritual and Blues, and Charleston. The latter is by all odds the best, in thematic material, harmony, setting of melody to rhythm and in orchestration.

Gershwin's ever-welcome "Rhapsody" offers a striking, if odious, comparison. Granted there are banalities even in this piece, it nevertheless has a warmth of spirit, a freshness and a sincerity that mark it as good music. The thematic material is of great worth of its kind, and the construction of the composition is closely knit and well planned.

Some have it that jazz is a nightmare in the life of music. But when a Gershwin can write such a "Rhapsody," however, it doees not seem exeravagant to say that jazz is not a chaos of muted trumpets, crooning saxophones and broken rhythms, but a definitely important phase in the process of musical evolution.

Mr Chasins' "Parade" was intended to be a musical incarnation of the composer's aversion to parades and the hysterical mob force they represent to him. Neither in thematic material nor in emotional intensity did he succeed in conveying to one listened an iota of his personal feeling. "Parade" was notable, chiefly, for orchestral technique that stamped the composer as a musician of talent and promise in that respect.

Mr Sanroma, who was applauded vociferously, left, as usual, nothing to be desired in his performance.

Mr Fiedler deserved thanks for obtaining from his men an approximation of genuine jazz rhythm. No other, apparently, can do it. In the Wagner music, he strove for general outline, and impressed chiefly with his broad and forceful interpretations. The wealth of instrumental detail in the "Siegfried Idyll," however, was excellently brought forth, with delicacy and clarity.

momentary feeling that the ubiquitous "Bolero" was stalking among the players; witness the patter of a gentle drum roll which continued, at intersals throughout the piece. Yet the similarity soon ceased, and "Parade" became none other than its quite charming self—a rhythmic piece of writing for modern orchestra, which apparently was well liked by the audience. The piece deserves a second hearing.

To Gershwin's well-worn "Rhapsody" went applausive honors last night. Perhaps one may qualify, and say that honors were even between the "Rhapsody" and the overture to "Tannhäuser." Certainly one may not overlook the shouts of approval which greeted orchestra, conductor and the modest Mr. Sanromá upon the conclusion of the perfromance, nor may one overlook the fact that this piece continues to please where Mr. Gershwin's later works receive but a modicum of attention. Satisfied, happy, another Sunday evening audience thanked Mr. Fiedler for an hour and a half of excellent entertainment.

G. M. S.

Monitor Music Mayos

Sunday Pops Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall, the second of the Sunday evening Pop concerts was given. As on the opening Sunday night two weeks ago, the house was "sold out," with extra chairs again being set against the side walls. Mr. Fiedler again succeeded in pleasing all tastes. He devoted the first half of his program to works of Wagner, including the Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin," "A Siegfried Idyll," an excerpt from "Götterdämmerung" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser." There followed Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," a first orchestral performance in Boston, "Parade" by Chasins, for the first time to a Boston audience, and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with the competent Mr. Sanromá as soloist.

With more than ordinary warmth did the audience applaud the Wagnerian music. Mr. Fiedler and his band gave many moments of genuine pleasure to those who frequent the hall during the "regular" season, and it is a matter for comment that the men are able to infuse their performances with what appears to be the most spontaneous enthusiasm.

Of course, interest centered in the Tansman and Chasins numbers. It must be an intrepid pianist indeed who will now present a piano arrangement of the "Sonatine Transatlantique." With the orchestral diversifications attainable and tonal color made possible through the use of a modern orchestra, a mere one-man piano will sound tame enough. With opportunity for cool comparison, one turns thumbs down on any but the orchestral version from this time forth. And yet, singularly enough, despite its modern rhythms, its use of the wailing saxophone (excellently played, by the way), its trick percussion and so on, the audience remained but politely enthusiastic over it. Wagner, so far, had received by far the majority of votes.

With the opening measures of the "Parade" by Chasins, one had a rgest Evening Circulation i

MARTHA

The Medicine Man says: "Two day keep the doctor away." I time now.

Salads Big Aid to Beauty and Health

From Martha Lee's Monday Morning Broadcast over Station WAAB

Younger Men And a Revival From Wagner

The Law, the 'Siegfried Idyl,' Jazz, Chasins, Sanroma, All at a Sunday Pop

REASONABLY, Symphony Hall intends that the public of the Sunday Pops, which now fills every seat and overflows into the standing-room, shall know where the blame falls. Conspicuously on the program last evening stood this admonition:

> Refreshments of any kind shall not be offered for sale and no smoking shall be permitted in a theater or a public hall during an entertainment. [From the Sunday Regulations of the Department of Public Safety of Massachusetts

It is in order to submit once more that such interference with innocent habit and pleasure encourages irritated spirits to break every trivial law and petty regulation coming their way; makes the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a laughing-stock to its own citizens and to strangers within its gates; added to similar restrictions, dissuades visitors, accustomed to the usual freedoms of twentieth-century civilization, from this port and this good city of Boston. There in Symphony Hall last evening were 2600 listeners, well-mannered, well-intentioned, altogether decent and orderly. They might not smoke at the tables, but they had only to take ten steps into the corridors to smoke their fill. They might not buy so much as a box of chocolates; but if they had them in pocket, they were free to eat them. The distinction between what is permissible at the Pops on Sunday evening and on the other six days of the week, is altogether legal, artificial, intolerant and absurd. It is ridiculous in the third decade of the twentieth century to deny to adults, on Sunday or any other day, liberty in refreshment and entertainment. Sooner or later, even the State House will discover that grown-up people are in fact grown-up and like to be treated as free agents—"the Lord's Day" included.

The first half of the program fell to Wagner, and among the four pieces one that Boston has seldom heard of late—the "Siegfried Idyl." Through twelve seasons it has been overlooked at the Symphony Concerts—and with such strings, woodwinds and horns as Dr. Koussevitzky has at command! If within that time it has been played at The Pops, the occasion has been rare. Yet the "Siegfried Idyl" is a Wagnerian masterpiece, like no other in the whole range of his work. He is writing a purely symphonic music, though the motivs, for the most part, come from the Third Act of his opera, "Siegfried." He is writing for intimate usage with little or no thought of public performance—to mark Cosima's birthday at Christmastide, to release her joy and his in Siegfried, their new-born son. They stand above the cradle and he speaks. The little orchestra plays upon the staircase of their house, and she listens. Finally it is music wrought in delicate texture and subdued coloring, infused with the poetry of tender affection, loving longing and quiet beatitude. Its only fellow is the introduction to the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger," and that is written on a larger scale, to have place in a romantic comedy, more outspoken and diverse in emotional flow.

In the daily procession of The Pops Mr. Fiedler had little time to rehearse what for most of the players may have been an unfamiliar piece. Nor in this stage of his progress as conductor is he to be reproached with a performance that at moments might have been more sensitive, plastic and euphonious. Enough that the hungry ear heard anew the "Siegfried Idyl"; while answering imagination sufficed for outer gloss and inner implication. Before the listener passed a music in which Wagner shuts himself within narrow confines because, so doing, he may more felicitously express himself and gain his end. Within them, a super-sensitive variety of texture is woven into a persistent loveliness; an adroitly changeful flow sustains a pervasive mood; a few colors are brightened or darkened, blended or contrasted, refinement upon refinement, until the whole becomes a sublimated magic upon the enfolded senses. The "Siegfried Idyl" upsprings from the motivs of the hero whose name the new-born son and this, his music, shall bear. Yet Wagner so mutes and transmutes them, so stays his instinctive richness and flood, that it sounds with quiet gladness, still affection, tender longing and visioning, a blest happiness and peace.

A single note, a passing phrase, the lightest modulation, inflection, shading, and we listeners are stirred. As there is no more sensitive, so there is no finer-fingered Wagner. He is writing most intimately, yet the benediction of the "Siegfried Idyl" falls upon all the fathers and all the mothers who may stand dreaming in happy content beside the cradles of their sons. It is his moment of surcease from the theater, from his epics and tragedies in words and tones. Tone-poet he cannot help but be; yet this time "from the heart to the heart" as Beethoven had it on a very different occasion. Some of us take leave to think the lyric pages of "Die Meistersinger" the rarest music in beauty that man has yet written. In that very house Wagner had finished them. Now into the "Siegfried Idyl" he distilled their quintessence. . . . Mr. Fiedler went on to the heroical sweep and sound of the other Siegfried's "Rhine Journey"; then to the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the only proclamation of triumphant virtue of which mind and spirit seldom weary. Yet above these sonorities lingered the "Siegfried Idyl," soft and bright and vaporous.

After Wagner the young men. First Mr. Tansman, fresh, as it were, from his sojourn in the United States a year and more ago. Then and there, following the custom of European composers, he listened to much jazz. He also has an absorbent temperament—whether for Polish folk-songs or American Blues. Consequently composition at leisure in Paris, to wit, a "Transatlantic Sonatina" in two versions: One, for piano, played by Mr. Gieseking in Symphony Hall last winter, another, for orchestra with conspicuous piano and saxophone parts, now played for the first time hereabouts. A Foxtrot, with a sentimentalized middle section, gives Mr. Tansman a first movement; a Spiritual and a Blues provide him with a slow division and a scherzo-like intermezzo: a Charleston spares not in vehemently rhythmic close. Mr. Tansman's adaptation of a highly orthodox form to highly unorthodox content is amusing to connoisseurs. Once more the young gentleman from Poland-Paris has all the facilities.

The casual hearer will be more impressed with the American quality of the jazz. Unlike most Europeans, Mr. Tansman neither thins, dulls, nor refines upon it. The celebrated Krenék of "Jonny spielt auf" wrote pale stuff at third hand. Ravel wound sophisticated strands, jazz-spun, into sophisticated chamber music. Lambert infuses jazz-like inflections and coloring into an idiom of his own. Mr. Tansman, above all the others, expropriates the real thing. His Foxtrot, even to the virtuoso-ingenuities for various instruments, is a Foxtrot naked to the ear. His Charleston flings about to the satisfaction of all beholders. If his Spiritual does not go very deep, it has the right shape and color; while with the Blues he is sure and sounding again. One of Mr. Whiteman's bandsmen used to play, at need, through a hard hat. Mr. Tansman without a moment's hesitation, claps it on Euterpe's head.

Next Mr. Abram Chasins and "Parade"—the piece in which Mr. Toscanini, as the saying went in New York, "discovered America." There have been more exciting discoveries; while the composer's anxious friends might have hung less literary baggage about his neck. Mr. Chasins hears a passing procession: hears it advancing and receding; hears it also in sustained and broken rhythms. The sound stirs in him anxieties, resentments, alarms, inasmuch as parades depress him and rouse his dread of mob-spirit. Now in the underbody, now on the surface, he would impart this mood. In degree, with reciprocal labor on the part of the listening imagination, he succeeds. Parade and sensations dwindle away and a compact, neatly made, workaday tone-poem, mostly of the common stock, is at end. Well enough on a Pop Sunday; but the "maestro illustrissimo" might advisedly broaden his explorations of the music of this land.

Last, Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" as fresh, though by no means so surprising, as when it emerged seven years ago. There are good tunes in it as the slow section, with Russian flavors, still witnesses. There are pianistic and orchestral acrobatics, intrinsically jazz-like, as the finale over-abundantly testifies. There is, above all, a first section that sounds to this day like no music the listener has heard before or since—Mr. Gershwin releasing the jazz that long had been second nature to him, then discovering, con amore and con fuoco, that he could give it musical form, substance, seemliness and effect.

There were also for this particular occasion, as for Mr. Tansman's Sonatina, Mr. Tapley who is expert saxophonist, and Mr. Sanromá who played the piano-part with a Gershwinian boldness and fervor, sonority and rhythmical energy, with a more than Gershwinian mastery of means to ends. From his hands the sheer beat and plangency carried all before them. Mr. Fiedler can spur any jazzy piece; while as everyone knows—for blame or for praise—the Bostonians can be the jazziest of symphony orchestras. To Mr. Gruenberg and to Mr. Carpenter, as now to Mr. Gershwin, they have given proof. At the end, clapping, shouting and through the happy tumult Mr Sanromá in and out. What say, Mr. Chasins or even Mr. Tansman? H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

There is a possibility that Sir Hamilton Harty, the noted conductor of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester, in England, will be heard at Symphony Hall before The Pope are at an end. The management of the Boston Orchestra has invited him to be guest-conductor on a Sunday evening, should the time of his arrival in New York and his engagements in Los Angeles and San Francisco permit him to do so.

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of Harvard College

March, "Veritas" ..... Densmore
Overture to the Hindu Play, "Sakountala" ..... Goldmark
Tales from Johann Strauss .... Korngold
Choral Numbers:
My Spirit be Joyful ..... Bach
Inimici autem ..... Lassus
Spring Returns ..... Morenzio
Chorus from "Pinafore" .. Sullivan
Suite from the Ballet, "Love the Sorcerer" ..... de Falla
Overture, "The Year 1812" .. Chaikovsky
Choral Numbers:
Salamaleikum ..... Cornelius
The Hundred Pipers, Scotch Folk-Song
Coronation Scene from "Boris," Mussorgsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "Girl Crazy" ..... Gershwin
Tango, "Jalousie" ..... Gade
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse

Assisting: The Harvard Glee Club

Conductors:
A. Fiedler A. T. Davison

May 29

THE EVENING TRIBU

Wagner and Jazz Heard on Same Program

By AMBROSE L. McLAUGHLIN

NOT so very many years ago such a thing as mixing so-called classic music with the popular kind was unthinkable, and justly so, because the popular stuff at that time and for many years before was a pretty feeble thing at its best. But nowadays certain works in the jazz category have found their way through the stately portals of the most sacrosanct concert halls and opera houses, and a few have made quite favorable impressions on their generally discriminating audiences.

Last Sunday evening at the "Pops" concert in Symphony hall, Boston, Conductor Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of 80 symphony players presented a program of Wagner excerpts and followed them up with three examples of the "classic jazz" type. The Wagner numbers were the Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll from "Siegfried," the Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser." As usual the sturdy Wagnerian music was relished by the capacity audience, but interest seemed to gravitate to the orchestral versions of Tansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique," Chasin's "Parade," and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma at the piano. Frankly speaking we would enjoy hearing all three again and again under similar conditions, for the reason that they were given such exceptionally fine treatment. The Tansman piece in three sections—Foxtrot, Spiritual-Blues and Charleston—was the first orchestral performance in Boston. The Chasins number was the very first Boston hearing, but the Gershwin rhapsody is now quite widely known and respected in certain quarters. Mr. Sanroma gave a highly pleasing rendition of the piano part. His playing was marked by a brilliant technique and the audience was more enthusiastic over this number than the always dependable "Tannhauser" overture.

During the past decade there has been a decided change in the general style of popular music as generated in this country. The sickly sentimental rhythms have almost become extinct and in their place has arisen that species called jazz or blues. When it was announced that Paul Whiteman and his band were to "invade" Carnegie hall in New York and other places devoted to the musically pretentious, a great howl rent the air. But Paul came, drew the plaudits and has gone the way of all "bold adventurers." Across the water Krenek's jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," was acclaimed the musical sensation of the age and was glorified in extravagant press reviews. It was produced at the Metropolitan in New York five or six times during the season of 1928-1929, but has not been given since. In other words, there was not sufficient public interest shown to keep the work in the repertoire even for a second season. We heard it in February, 1929, and believed then that its vogue would be short-lived. There seemed to be little musical value in the score and that little very much inferior to the jazz rhythms and effects of Gershwin and other American writers, who are musical craftsmen, well-schooled in orchestral scoring. They have nothing in common with "tin pan alley."

Concerning the future of such works as those by Tansman and Chasins, which were given such splendid renditions by the "Pops" orchestra, no individual at all conversant with the history and development of musical forms would hazard a guess, let alone an authoritative prediction. Who would have been rash enough, not so many years back, to say that the day was coming when such a musical combination would be given in Symphony hall? To the ears of those who endeavor to keep in the vanguard, such a program is most welcome, if only for the sake of comparison. By all means let the new music be heard and that which has sufficient musical merit and originality will hold its place. The rest will be taken by the winds of oblivion.

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, will direct the final Sunday evening Pop concert of the season, in Symphony Hall, June 21.

JUNE 8, 1931

The distinguished English conductor, who is making his first visit to America this spring, has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts at Hollywood Bowl in California. His appearance in Boston will be his only engagement in the eastern United States. Sir Hamilton is famous as a composer as well as a conductor. He was formerly conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

lar music from a native source will be heard in a selection from Kern's "Showboat."

Already Mr. Fiedler has reminded his followers that there were other members of the Strauss family besides Johann, by playing Josef Strauss' attractive waltz, "Music of the Spheres." On Thursday evening he will play a waltz by brother Edouard, "Doctrinen," presumably not so profound as its title would suggest. Friday's concert brings the ballet "Borodin," by Tcherepnine, announced by Dr. Koussevitzky for the final Monday Symphony Concert, but withdrawn from the programme at the last moment because, as it was said, the conductor found the music too light in character. At the Pops such an objection would scarcely hold. Before it comes another reminder of the past Symphony season, the "March to the Scaffold," from Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The concert of Saturday evening will, at [illegible] espe-

[illegible] previous [illegible] Arnold [illegible] Pop [illegible] Library [illegible] ll-Bax" [illegible] ondon, [illegible] ligent [illegible] John [illegible] s Goos-

sens, [illegible] with his orchestra, chose "Mediterranean" to wind up an evening of "short bits." This piece, originally written for the piano, lasts a bare four minutes. It is dedicated to Gustav Holst.

Eric Bloom, contributing notes to the Bax Program just mentioned, remarked how this sworn Celtic artist turned his attention occasionally, but fleetingly and rather superficially to other climes. His "Traditional Songs of France," some piano fragments with Russian titles, and "Mediterranean," are cases in point.

"'Mediterranean' reveals an entirely new side of Arnold Bax's genius," wrote Eric Bloom, "for he assimilates here a Southern idiom as perfectly in keeping with the subject in hand as it is unexpected in the composer, who goes so far in his geographical precision that we can even locate wtihout the possibility of a mistake the exact part of the Mediterranean he set out to paint. Almost from the first bar we know that he must have been thinking of the Spanish coast."

This surmise is born out by the music's triple rhythm, rubato, which might be a seguidilla from Bizet or Albeniz. The castanets and tambourine clinch the theory, as do the accompanying violins. "quasi mandolino." It is a lilting and langorous music, quite in accord, if the truth must be told, with the northern tourist's idea of what should go with Spanish moonlight. The lesson is long since learned that Spanish music produced beyond the Pyrenees lacks the native vividness and wild tang. Let your foreigner speak frankly in his own language, even in the borrowed rhythm, and he may be forgiven. So Bax, with his delicate color, his half-lights, his subtle command of detail, lifts this piece shoulders above a hundred others of little consequence. The composer makes no attempt to set the world on fire—it is sometimes enough to content the ears of some of it for a short space. Bax seems to realize with Delius, Vaughan Williams and other Englishmen that a charming and an unassuming interlude of three or four minutes' length can be eminently useful in the laying out of orchestral programs.

"Request Night"

For next Wednesday evening at The Pops Mr. Fiedler proposed a "Request Program." By report from Symphony Hall, the balloting was uncommonly heavy. For the most part, it ran to "old favorites," with Ravel's "Bolero," Grainger's "Country-Garden" and the movie waltz, from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," for additions out of the present day. "Bolero," it appears, received twice as many votes as any other piece, from which sign of the times the purists in music and morals may infer—what they will. Here is the program as the conductor finally adjusted it:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony .. Chaikovsky
First Suite from the Music to "Peer Gynt." Grieg
Largo ..... Handel
Bolero ..... Ravel
Waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time" ..... Stolz
Country Garden ..... Grainger
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Joh. Strauss

The "encore pieces," also chosen by vote, will be:

Tango, "Jalousie" ..... Gade
Humoresque ..... Dvorák
Hungarian Dance, No. 5 ..... Brahms
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann." Offenbach
Flight of the Bee ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

All of which is quite natural and understandable, save the passion for that mediocre movie-waltz—and with the "Blue Danube" on the same program!—or the neglect of Mr. Gershwin, whom Mr. Fieldler has deservingly cultivated these six weeks.

Mr. Stokowski Catches Up

Emerging from Russia, where he was questing for novel music, Mr. Stokowski heard in Berlin for the first time of the Fascist affronts in Bologna and Milan to Mr. Toscannini. He expressed himself warmly on the subject and entirely in sympathy with the abused conductor. Mr. Stokowski has no high opinion of political hymnology at symphony concerts. "You might as well expect a painter to wave flags before the pictures in an art gallery," he told the correspondent of the Herald Tribune. "There is no place for politics in the concert-hall."

[illegible]he [illegible]Pop"
[illegible]Season,
[illegible]hwin,
[illegible]na

[illegible] two thous-
[illegible]ne may at confession.
[illegible], filling the loor and the balconies of Symphony Hall last evening, heard Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" eagerly and responsively; whereas the one, having timed himself, arrived at the moment when Mr. Fiedler and the Pop orchestra were rising to their feet in answer to round upon round of applause. The one declines "The Pathetic" as a summer music. In his ears, even on a gray Sunday, neither the self-revelations of Chaikovsky before a vision of mortality nor the melodies and rhythms in which he clothed them suit the high, warm tides of June. The self-revelations—some call them neuroses—belong to the wane of the year. The melodies, often intrinsically sensuous, may be antidote against winter's cold.

Not so, however, with the two thousand. For them, "The Pathetic" knows neither times nor seasons. These forty years, in America and in England—but nowhere else—it has been the most popular of symphonies. Its hold upon the general ear does not lessen. Even Beethoven's Fifth, which is a very different matter, may hardly vie with it. Possibly "The Pathetic" maintains this vogue by its melodies which are "writ large," by its transparent course, by its fervors in all things, rather than by Chaikovsky's evasions, flights and despairs when he hears Death a-rustling in the wainscot. We Americans are seldom morbid when we contemplate our final dissolution. Perhaps that morbidity in a neurotic Slav, making music of it, fascinates us. And music that excites our nerves.

There were other pieces to be heard—for the first time Bax's "Mediterranean," originally a piano-piece, scored for orchestra back in the nineteen-twenties, somehow, somewhere unearthed by the exploring Fiedler. It is no more than four minutes long; yet makes its effect as instantly and completely as, say, a turn in a vaudeville theater must. Before it has proceeded through ten measures listeners feel the warmth that emanates from nearly all Bax's music. Composition sets him aglow. The hearer may not choose but sympathize. And how quick is Bax with his sensuous Spanish tune and his animating rhythms! They kindle his romantic temperament. And how deft with his manipulations, transitions, surprises! Each measure leads into the next, but almost always with an unexpected detail. The impulse, the music-paper, and atmosphere in four minutes—the surer since Mr. Fiedler did not miss an elastic pace and rhythm.

In his last years, Saint-Saëns "in person" (as the movies have taught us all to say) paid a visit to Symphony Hall. After Dr. Muck and the orchestra had done wonders with his serious music, the composer, "at the piano," played, behind his mask of yellowed ivory, a trifle named "Wedding Cake." Now, the serious "works" have nearly faded from the repertory; while the one piece that recurs is "The Animals' Carnival," another trifle—which may, or may not, be the revenge of time and of Symphony Hall. Last evening, it was played again, with fewer omissions than usual, with smiles and laughter from the audience good to hear in these usually sober precincts, with timely reminder that, after all, Saint-Saëns was a man of skill, wit, humor and dry fancy.

By these qualities what was originally a chamber-piece for private performance among intimates persists in a semi-serious concert across Symphony Hall. The elephants do their parody of Berlioz's "Dance of the Sylphs"; Mr. Vondrak at the double-bass plays for them; and we are all amused. Saint-Saëns discloses a marvellous observation and intuition of the henyard, and these orchestral cluckings are uncanny to hear. Pianists are mockingly tossed into the menagerie; the whole orchestra cannot check their showy pretentions. The lions parade and roar in travesty. Or the finale would have the animals as gods à la Offenbach. Yet there are subtleties with the tortoises; finesse with the darting fish—"Aquarium" was omitted last evening; a pretty fancy with the cuckoo; while what else can "The Swan" be nowadays but elegy for Anna Pavlova departed? Saint-Saëns was amusing himself when he wrote this jeu d'esprit. Unlike much other music with which composers have diverted themselves, it also diverts audiences. But he could hardly have suspected that

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
The Old Refrain ..... Kreisler
Overture to the Operetta, "Orpheus in the Underworld" ..... Offenbach
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Rachem ..... Mana-Zucca
Overture, "The Year 1812" .. Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ..... Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
March, "On the Mall" ..... Goldman

Conductor: A. Fiedler

the next generation would find it his surviving epitome.

Mr. Sanromá played the many-sided and witty part for the first piano among the animals; then was pianist in Mr. Fiedler's needlessly abbreviated version of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." There is scarcely a piece that the conductor does better, which fact makes his cuts the less understandable. Is he not, as with some of his suites, over-afraid that he will exhaust the attention of a usually eager audience? As it was, the long and loud applause for Mr. Sanromá was pleasure to hear and record. He excels in such music of keen rhythms, plangent tone, hard edge and flamboyant bravura. He has excelled, indeed, in all that he has undertaken the season through, both at the Symphony Concerts and at The Pops. No task was too small for his pains; none, however exacting, exceeded his ripening powers. He made believable the extraordinary piano-part that Lourie wrote into "Liturgical Sonata." His light, fine hand with figures and arabesques added graces to Pilati's little Suite for Piano and Strings. He was the modernist pianist, par excellence, by the verve of his rhythm and the brilliance of his tone in Stravinsky's "Caprice." He outdid himself in both the ornate and the songful measures of Lambert's "Rio Grande," his ripest performance of the year. Now at The Pops he does no less well with the piano-parts in Tansman's Sonatina and Gershwin's Rhapsody. It is high time Mr. Sanromá's name were added to the list of virtuosi in the orchestra. He keeps pace with them.

H. T. P.

At Wellesley Next Year

Concerts are heard in the autumn and the winter. They are arranged late in the spring and early in the summer. Hence from Wellesley comes, with June, the announcement of the concerts in Alumnæ Hall at the college, under the auspices of the Wellesley College Fund, arranged as heretofore by the practiced and open-minded Dr. Hamilton Macdougall. Two will be orchestral—by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra on Oct 21; by Mr. Sokoloff and the Cleveland Orchestra on Feb. 15. In the chamber-concert there is new departure. Two pianists of high reputation as a pair—Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson—will give it on Nov. 12; but to their duets will be added Bach's Double Concerto in C major with a small string orchestra for accompaniment and Alumnæ Hall for fitting concert-room. The violinist, to be heard on Jan. 21, is the admirable Jelly d' Aranyi.

For singers two are newcomers. First and foremost on Feb. 5, the remarkable Conchita Supervia, borrowed from the Chicago Opera, with a voice of both soprano and contralto range, mistress of the old, slow-paced, expressive bravura, mistress no less of Spanish songs, with an equal reputation in the opera house and the concert-hall. Next, on March 8, John Goss, the English singer, with an assisting quartet of male voices. They have found a new field in sea-chanties; they choose also from the Elizabethan composers. Lastly, on April 15, John Charles Thomas, now a wide-ranging singer of songs. . . . By these signs a well-balanced and well-freshened list. As heretofore tickets will cost $10, with the usual reduction to $8 for the college. Subscriptions may now be made to Dr. Macdougell at Wellesley—cheques to the Wellesley College Fund; but payment may be deferred till Oct. 6.

Memo. I

There is to be a new sort of novelty at The Pops. On Wednesday evening of next week, June 17, the instrument that draws musical tones electrically from the air will be heard with and without the orchestra. The Russian scientist and musician, Theremin, now living and working in New York, first invented it; then improved materially upon his invention. It is called by his name the Theremin.

Memo. II

On Sunday at a semi-serious concert, Mr. Fiedler conducts "in tails."

[illegible]oma and Leo Litwin were piano soloists in the Saint-Saens' sic. Mr Sanroma played with his ual dash and spirit the solo pa the "Rhapsody."

The symphony was well playe without much subtlety in minute tails. There were occasions when accompanying inner voices stood too prominently. In this partic symphony, which to one person is poorest of three best known Tchai sky symphonies, this latter defici reveals glaringly the tawdriness o manipulation and the banality of m of the thematic material. Mr Fi followed the letter of the score i second movement, however, played the part "Allegro con gr

Sir Hamilton Harty, the eminent conductor of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester and London, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra t be guest-conductor at the concer in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, June 21. His orchestra will be the present orchestra of The Pops, possibly with a few necessary additions. He will make his own program, which will soon come to hand. Even on Midsummer Day he deserves the presence and the interest of the concert-going public.

Sir Hamilton will be on his way to Los Angeles and San Francisco, where he is to conduct in July. In the summer suspension of concerts and dispersal of orchestras, there seemed to be no welcome or opportunity for him in the East—until Symphony Hall, fortunately situated, rose to the occasion.

THE POPS

[illegible] program for the third Pops Sun[illegible]vening Symphony concert yester[illegible]n Symphony hall was the follow[illegible]Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in [illegible]or; Bax, "Mediterranean"; Saint[illegible], "The Animals' Carnival" (S. M[illegible]ma and Leo Litwin, pianists) [illegible]twin, "Rhapsody in Blue." Fo[illegible] whose serious trend of mind ex[illegible] even into warm weather there [illegible]he "Pathetic" symphony; the rest [illegible] program was in a lighter vein.

Fiedler conducted the first Bos[illegible]erformance of Bax "Mediterran[illegible]. The composition, originally writ[illegible]or the piano, is not long; one ra[illegible]wishes it was, for it seems a pity [illegible]anything as charming should last [illegible]ort a time. Mr. Bax is unusually [illegible]y in the Spanish idiom; so well [illegible]he assimilated this speech and [illegible] it his own that one finds no trace [illegible]n English accent, no visible sign [illegible]he is not speaking his native [illegible]e. His subtle rhythms smack of [illegible]a. Chromatic elaborations he adds [illegible] lend character and interest, but [illegible] does the decoration take from [illegible]fundamental qualities of the piece. [illegible], composer is content with writing [illegible]y music—does not strive to as[illegible]h. Mr. Fiedler's interpretation was [illegible]pathetic, though a less hurried [illegible]ing might have brought out more [illegible]ly the languorous beauty and at[illegible]pheric details of the music.

[illegible]onductor, soloists and orchestra [illegible]ed forces that none of the wit and [illegible]or in Saint-Saens's "Jeux d'esprit" [illegible]ld be slighted. The "Animals" [illegible]sed the audience to the nth degree. [illegible]or is an emotion that is not so [illegible]y portrayed in music. Saint-Saens's [illegible]ful hands have done this admirably. [illegible]srs. Sanroma and Litwin and Mr. [illegible]ze understood perfectly the com[illegible]r's intent. Mr. Sangendoen played [illegible]e Swan" exquisitely.

[illegible]r. Sanroma in Gershwin's "Rhap[illegible]y in Blue," repeated by request, [illegible]wed himself not only a master of [illegible] playing, but an artist who plays [illegible] type of music with the same taste [illegible] fine phrasing he displays in the [illegible]e classical.

[illegible]he symphony was played with vim [illegible] vigor, though at times it lacked [illegible]tlety and finesse.

[illegible] large and sympathetic audience ap[illegible]ded enthusiastically.

L. B. D.

[illegible]nts and Sounds Across The Pops

[illegible] always in order to take The [illegible]ghtly, and lightness, in the sum[illegible]mate of Boston, may extend also [illegible]garments that clothe them—more [illegible]larly to those of Mr. Fiedler him[illegible]. For that wise young man, skillful [illegible]ring his way between innovation [illegible]stom, has risked another new de[illegible]e and is setting sartorial example [illegible]uctors who may likewise be em[illegible] on these warm June evenings.

[illegible]r has slipped into Symphony Hall [illegible]st night—perhaps on nights be[illegible]Mr. Fiedler met it with well-timed [illegible]lance. That is to say, he has dis[illegible] the evening clothes—with tails—[illegible]ed to be conductorial uniform, [illegible]er the height of the thermometer. [illegible]ay, a blue serge jacket—or was it [illegible]—and white flannel trousers [illegible] him, the "summer" and "infor[illegible]ening dress that, spreading East[illegible]t of the West, is fast becoming [illegible]an habit. (Shall London pre[illegible]our raiment? A thousand times [illegible]n summers the heats of which [illegible]rs not!) Mr. Fiedler conducted [illegible]e bodily comfort. The audience [illegible]d him without shock and with [illegible]e, though some among it were [illegible] encased in the starched and sombre armor he had discarded. The "informal" Pops were at last informal on the stage. "Dulce et decorum est desipere in loco."

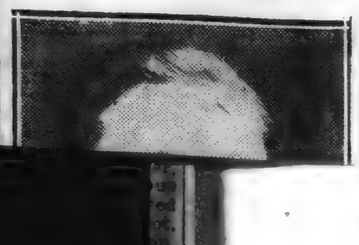
There was also new music on the program—three numbers from the "Ballet Borodin," rehearsed and then discarded by Dr. Koussevitzky toward the end of the regular season. The elder Cherepnin, now dwelling in Paris, wrote it; perhaps intended it as "homage" to Borodin, even as he made a Sinfonietta in memory of his master, Rimsky-Korsakov. Yet this "light stuff" seemed a long way from the serious-minded Borodin: while to the non-Russian ear there were few discoverable traces of the folk-idioms that the elder composer cherished. Cherepnin, as in his ballets for Diaghiley, has the Russian instincts toward virtuosity and fancy when light music is in hand. Otherwise this "Ballet Borodin" might have been written by any practised and mild-mannered composer, with a liking for that sort of thing about this time. As it was, no one at Symphony Hall proffered any clew to a baffling title.

At a guess—for there are no program-books at The Pops—the first number might have been an introductory revery. The second added Miss Adelle Alberts and Mr. Raymond Simonds to the orchestra to sing "Ah's" in soprano and tenor tones. Perhaps they replaced the chorus, which was to be part of the Koussevitzkian performance; but where this second number stood, or what title it bore, in the scenario of the ballet was beyond guessing—unless it was a Serenade. Finally came a dance. Cherepnin writes a light, polished, transparent music. Into its thin body he washes color neatly and prettily. Over it occasionally he sprinkles the spice of modernist harmony and dissonance—politely and unobtrusively. His rhythms are oftener gentle than incisive—by Russian standards even tame. His vigorous moments, as these excerpts disclosed them, will never offend the nicest taste. . . . Someone in the o[illegible] called it a salon-ballet. He was wrong.

H.

29, 1931.

PULVINO VIOLIN RECITAL TONIGHT



Concertino Huber, Op. 6
Aram Franklin
(2nd Course)

a. Old Black Joe Foster
b. Flow Gently Sweet Afton English Folk Tune
Francis Lawler
(Preparatory Course)

Rigoletto Fantasie Verdi-Singelee
Victoria Pulvino
(2nd Course)

Concertstuck Portnoff, Op. 14
Carl Boria
(3rd Course)

La Follia, Sonata with a cadenza by Leonard Corelli
Frank Consentino
(4th Course)
at the piano, Gildo Consentino

NOT so very many years ago such a thing as mixing so-called classic music with the popular kind was unthinkable, and justly so, because the popular stuff at that time and for many years before was a pretty feeble thing at its best. But nowadays certain works in the jazz category have found their way through the stately portals of the most sacrosanct concert halls and opera houses, and a few have made quite favorable impressions on their generally discriminating audiences.

Last Sunday evening at the "Pops" [illegible] Symphony Hall, Boston

es—New York and Boston

Premiere

—TODAY—

ITOL

The Pops

Fifth Week—This summer the Pop Concerts will run through Saturday, July 4. It is now mid-season with them at Symphony Hall, and Mr. Fiedler is freshening the programs as for a new start. On Monday he will bring back the suite of eighteenth-century dances that Mottl drew from Rameau's operas and ballets. Along with it he will repeat Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"—the success of last Sunday's concert—Mr. Sanromá will again play the piano-part. On Tuesday, the program runs familiar course, with the Men's Choir of the Square and Compass Club assisting. Four numbers enlarge the list for Wednesday: Tansman's "Transatlantic Sonatina," jazzy with a Foxtrot, a Blues and a Charleston, well-liked withal at last Sunday's Pop; Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta"; the suite of dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker"; a selection from Mr. Kerns's "Show Boat," musically head and shoulders above such pieces.

On Thursday, there is room for the Viennese Strauss-es—Edouard with his "Doctrinen" waltz; Johann with his "Radetzky March." Into Friday's program will go the suite from Cherepnin's "Borodin Ballet," with assisting voices [illegible] Koussevitzky put by toward

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO BE POPS GUEST

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, will direct the final Sunday evening Pop concert of the season, in Symphony Hall, June 21.

JUNE 8, 1931

The distinguished English conductor, who is making his first visit to America this spring, has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts at Hollywood Bowl in California. His appearance in Boston will be his only engagement in the eastern United States. Sir Hamilton is famous as a composer as well as a conductor. He was formerly conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

The present season of Pops has run half its course and continues to draw to Symphony Hall large and enthusiastic audiences that testify to the personal popularity of Mr. Fiedler and to the wisdom of his programmes, that avoid excesses and extremes, whether of light or serious music. For the week to come Mr. Fiedler's lists run true to form. The success of Mr. Sanroma with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," at last Sunday's concert has led to a repetition of that piece, with him as pianist, at the concert of tomorrow evening, and again at that of next Sunday evening.

On Tuesday evening the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club, Warren W. Adams, conductor, will add variety to a programme, replete with popular orchestral numbers. Wednesday will bring a repetition of Tansman's clever assimilation of American jazz, by title, "Sonatine Transatlantique." Similar music from a native source will be heard in a selection from Kern's "Showboat."

Already Mr. Fiedler has reminded his followers that there were other members of the Strauss family besides Johann, by playing Josef Strauss' attractive waltz, "Music of the Spheres." On Thursday evening he will play a waltz by brother Edouard, "Doctrinen," presumably not so profound as its title would suggest. Friday's concert brings the ballet "Borodin," by Tcherepnine, announced by Dr. Koussevitzky for the final Monday Symphony Concert, but withdrawn from the programme at the last moment because, as it was said, the conductor found the music too light in character. At the Pops such an objection would scarcely hold. Before it comes another reminder of the past Symphony season, the "March to the Scaffold," from Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The concert of Saturday evening will, as usual, assemble especial favorites, including on this occasion Ravel's "Bolero."

Concert-Chronicle

Bax's Excursion

NO available records show a previous American performance of Arnold Bax's "Mediterranean," which Arthur Fiedler will introduce at the Pop Concert, Sunday. The Public Library turns up the program of an "all-Bax" concert given in Queen's Hall, London, on November 13, 1922, by such intelligent contemporaries as Harriet Cohen, John Coates, Lionel Tertis, and Eugene Goossens, Mr. Goossens, with his orchestra, chose "Mediterranean" to wind up an evening of "short bits." This piece, originally written for the piano, lasts a bare four minutes. It is dedicated to Gustav Holst.

Eric Bloom, contributing notes to the Bax Program just mentioned, remarked how this sworn Celtic artist turned his attention occasionally, but fleetingly and rather superficially to other climes. His "Traditional Songs of France," some piano fragments with Russian titles, and "Mediterranean," are cases in point.

"'Mediterranean' reveals an entirely new side of Arnold Bax's genius," wrote Eric Bloom, "for he assimilates here a Southern idiom as perfectly in keeping with the subject in hand as it is unexpected in the composer, who goes so far in his geographical precision that we can even locate wtihout the possibility of a mistake the exact part of the Mediterranean he set out to paint. Almost from the first bar we know that he must have been thinking of the Spanish coast."

This surmise is born out by the music's triple rhythm, rubato, which might be a seguidilla from Bizet or Albeniz. The castanets and tambourine clinch the theory, as do the accompanying violins, "quasi mandolino." It is a lilting and langorous music, quite in accord, if the truth must be told, with the northern tourist's idea of what should go with Spanish moonlight. The lesson is long since learned that Spanish music produced beyond the Pyrenees lacks the native vividness and wild tang. Let your foreigner speak frankly in his own language, even in the borrowed rhythm, and he may be forgiven. So Bax, with his delicate color, his half-lights, his subtle command of detail, lifts this piece shoulders above a hundred others of little consequence. The composer makes no attempt to set the world on fire—it is sometimes enough to content the ears of some of it for a short space. Bax seems to realize with Delius, Vaughan Williams and other Englishmen that a charming and an unassuming interlude of three or four minutes' length can be eminently useful in the laying out of orchestral programs.

"Request Night"

For next Wednesday evening at The Pops Mr. Fiedler proposed a "Request Program." By report from Symphony Hall, the balloting was uncommonly heavy. For the most part, it ran to "old favorites," with Ravel's "Bolero," Grainger's "Country-Garden" and the movie waltz, from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," for additions out of the present day. "Bolero," it appears, received twice as many votes as any other piece, from which sign of the times the purists in music and morals may infer—what they will. Here is the program as the conductor finally adjusted it:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony .. Chaikovsky
First Suite from the Music to "Peer Gynt," ..... Grieg
Largo ..... Handel
Bolero ..... Ravel
Waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time" ..... Stolz
Country Garden ..... Grainger
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Joh. Strauss

The "encore pieces," also chosen by vote, will be:

Tango, "Jalousie" ..... Gade
Humoresque ..... Dvořák
Hungarian Dance, No. 5 ..... Brahms
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann," ..... Offenbach
Flight of the Bee ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

All of which is quite natural and understandable, save the passion for that mediocre movie-waltz—and with the "Blue Danube" on the same program!—or the neglect of Mr. Gershwin, whom Mr. Fiedler has deservingly cultivated these six weeks.

Mr. Stokowski Catches Up

Emerging from Russia, where he was questing for novel music, Mr. Stokowski heard in Berlin for the first time of the Fascist affronts in Bologna and Milan to Mr. Toscannini. He expressed himself warmly on the subject and entirely in sympathy with the abused conductor. Mr. Stokowski has no high opinion of political hymnology at symphony concerts. "You might as well expect a painter to wave flags before the pictures in an art gallery," he told the correspondent of the Herald Tribune. "There is no place for politics in the concert-hall."

Pleasure and Profit at the "Sunday Pop"

"The Pathetic" Out of Season, Bax, Animals, Gershwin, Also Mr. Sanroma

WHAT is one against two thousand? But the one may at least make his confession. The two thousand, filling the floor and the balconies of Symphony Hall last evening, heard Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" eagerly and responsively; whereas the one, having timed himself, arrived at the moment when Mr. Fiedler and the Pop orchestra were rising to their feet in answer to round upon round of applause. The one declines "The Pathetic" as a summer music. In his ears, even on a gray Sunday, neither the self-revelations of Chaikovsky before a vision of mortality nor the melodies and rhythms in which he clothed them suit the high, warm tides of June. The self-revelations—some call them neuroses—belong to the wane of the year. The melodies, often intrinsically sensuous, may be antidote against winter's cold.

Not so, however, with the two thousand. For them, "The Pathetic" knows neither times nor seasons. These forty years, in America and in England—but nowhere else—it has been the most popular of symphonies. Its hold upon the general ear does not lessen. Even Beethoven's Fifth, which is a very different matter, may hardly vie with it. Possibly "The Pathetic" maintains this vogue by its melodies which are "writ large," by its transparent course, by its fervors in all things, rather than by Chaikovsky's evasions, flights and despairs when he hears Death a-rustling in the wainscot. We Americans are seldom morbid when we contemplate our final dissolution. Perhaps that morbidity in a neurotic Slav, making music of it, fascinates us. And music that excites our nerves.

There were other pieces to be heard—for the first time Bax's "Mediterranean," originally a piano-piece, scored for orchestra back in the nineteen-twenties, somehow, somewhere unearthed by the exploring Fiedler. It is no more than four minutes long; yet makes its effect as instantly and completely as, say, a turn in a vaudeville theater must. Before it has proceeded through ten measures listeners feel the warmth that emanates from nearly all Bax's music. Composition sets him aglow. The hearer may not choose but sympathize. And how quick is Bax with his sensuous Spanish tune and his animating rhythms! They kindle his romantic temperament. And how deft with his manipulations, transitions, surprises! Each measure leads into the next, but almost always with an unexpected detail. The impulse, the music-paper, and atmosphere in four minutes—the surer since Mr. Fiedler did not miss an elastic pace and rhythm.

In his last years, Saint-Saëns "in person" (as the movies have taught us all to say) paid a visit to Symphony Hall. After Dr. Muck and the orchestra had done wonders with his serious music, the composer, "at the piano," played, behind his mask of yellowed ivory, a trifle named "Wedding Cake." Now, the serious "works" have nearly faded from the repertory; while the one piece that recurs is "The Animals' Carnival," another trifle—which may, or may not, be the revenge of time and of Symphony Hall. Last evening, it was played again, with fewer omissions than usual, with smiles and laughter from the audience good to hear in these usually sober precincts, with timely reminder that, after all, Saint-Saëns was a man of skill, wit, humor and dry fancy.

By these qualities what was originally a chamber-piece for private performance among intimates persists in a semi-serious concert across Symphony Hall. The elephants do their parody of Berlioz's "Dance of the Sylphs"; Mr. Vondrak at the double-bass plays for them; and we are all amused. Saint-Saëns discloses a marvellous observation and intuition of the henyard, and these orchestral cluckings are uncanny to hear. Pianists are mockingly tossed into the menagerie; the whole orchestra cannot check their showy pretentions. The lions parade and roar in travesty. Or the finale would have the animals as gods à la Offenbach. Yet there are subtleties with the tortoises; finesse with the darting fish—"Aquarium" was omitted last evening; a pretty fancy with the cuckoo; while what else can "The Swan" be nowadays but elegy for Anna Pavlova departed? Saint-Saëns was amusing himself when he wrote this jeu d'esprit. Unlike much other music with which composers have diverted themselves, it also diverts audiences. But he could hardly have suspected that the next generation would find it his surviving epitome.

Mr. Sanromá played the many-sided and witty part for the first piano among the animals; then was pianist in Mr. Fiedler's needlessly abbreviated version of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." There is scarcely a piece that the conductor does better, which fact makes his cuts the less understandable. Is he not, as with some of his suites, over-afraid that he will exhaust the attention of a usually eager audience? As it was, the long and loud applause for Mr. Sanromá was pleasure to hear and record. He excels in such music of keen rhythms, plangent tone, hard edge and flamboyant bravura. He has excelled, indeed, in all that he has undertaken the season through, both at the Symphony Concerts and at The Pops. No task was too small for his pains; none, however exacting, exceeded his ripening powers. He made believable the extraordinary piano-part that Lourie wrote into "Liturgical Sonata." His light, fine hand with figures and arabesques added graces to Pilati's little Suite for Piano and Strings. He was the modernist pianist, par excellence, by the verve of his rhythm and the brilliance of his tone in Stravinsky's "Caprice." He outdid himself in both the ornate and the songful measures of Lambert's "Rio Grande," his ripest performance of the year. Now at The Pops he does no less well with the piano-parts in Tansman's Sonatina and Gershwin's Rhapsody. It is high time Mr. Sanromá's name were added to the list of virtuosi in the orchestra. He keeps pace with them.

H. T. P.

At Wellesley Next Year

Concerts are heard in the autumn and the winter. They are arranged late in the spring and early in the summer. Hence from Wellesley comes, with June, the announcement of the concerts in Alumnæ Hall at the college, under the auspices of the Wellesley College Fund, arranged as heretofore by the practiced and open-minded Dr. Hamilton Macdougall. Two will be orchestral—by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra on Oct 21; by Mr. Sokoloff and the Cleveland Orchestra on Feb. 15. In the chamber-concert there is new departure. Two pianists of high reputation as a pair—Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson—will give it on Nov. 12; but to their duets will be added Bach's Double Concerto in C major with a small string orchestra for accompaniment and Alumnæ Hall for fitting concert-room. The violinist, to be heard on Jan. 21, is the admirable Jelly d' Aranyi.

For singers two are newcomers. First and foremost on Feb. 5, the remarkable Conchita Supervia, borrowed from the Chicago Opera, with a voice of both soprano and contralto range, mistress of the old, slow-paced, expressive bravura, mistress no less of Spanish songs, with an equal reputation in the opera house and the concert-hall. Next, on March 8, John Goss, the English singer, with an assisting quartet of male voices. They have found a new field in sea-chanties; they choose also from the Elizabethan composers. Lastly, on April 15, John Charles Thomas, now a wide-ranging singer of songs. . . . By these signs a well-balanced and well-freshened list. As heretofore tickets will cost $10, with the usual reduction to $8 for the college. Subscriptions may now be made to Dr. Macdougell at Wellesley—cheques to the Wellesley College Fund; but payment may be deferred till Oct. 6.

Memo. I

There is to be a new sort of novelty at The Pops. On Wednesday evening of next week, June 17, the instrument that draws musical tones electrically from the air will be heard with and without the orchestra. The Russian scientist and musician, Theremin, now living and working in New York, first invented it; then improved materially upon his invention. It is called by his name the Theremin.

Memo. II

On Sunday at a semi-serious concert, Mr. Fiedler conducts "in tails."

[illegible]roma and Leo Litwin were piano soloists in the Saint-Saens' sic. Mr Sanroma played with his ual dash and spirit the solo pa the "Rhapsody."

The symphony was well playe without much subtlety in minute tails. There were occasions when accompanying inner voices stood too prominently. In this partic symphony, which to one person is poorest of three best known Tchai sky symphonies, this latter defici reveals glaringly the tawdriness o manipulation and the banality of m of the thematic material. Mr Fi followed the letter of the score i second movement, however, played the part "Allegro con gr

Sir Hamilton Harty, the eminent conductor of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester and London, has accepted the invitation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra t be guest-conductor at the concer in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, June 21. His orchestra will be the present orchestra of The Pops, possibly with a few necessary additions. He will make his own program, which will soon come to hand. Even on Midsummer Day he deserves the presence and the interest of the concert-going public.

Sir Hamilton will be on his way to Los Angeles and San Francisco, where he is to conduct in July. In the summer suspension of concerts and dispersal of orchestras, there seemed to be no welcome or opportunity for him in the East—until Symphony Hall, fortunately situated, rose to the occasion.

June 8

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
The Old Refrain ..... Kreisler
Overture to the Operetta, "Orpheus in the Underworld" ..... Offenbach
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Rachem ..... Mana-Zucca
Overture, "The Year 1812" .. Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ..... Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
March, "On the Mall" ..... Goldman

Conductor: A. Fiedler

THE POPS

[illegible] program for the third Pops Sun[illegible]ening Symphony concert yester[illegible] Symphony hall was the follow[illegible] Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in [illegible]or; Bax, "Mediterranean"; Saint[illegible] "The Animals' Carnival" (S. M[illegible]ma and Leo Litwin, pianists) [illegible]win, "Rhapsody in Blue." Fo[illegible] whose serious trend of mind ex[illegible] even into warm weather there[illegible] he "Pathetic" symphony; the rest [illegible] program was in a lighter vein.

Fiedler conducted the first Bos[illegible]erformance of Bax "Mediterran[illegible]. The composition, originally writ[illegible]or the piano, is not long; one ra[illegible] wishes it was, for it seems a pity [illegible] anything as charming should last [illegible]ort a time. Mr. Bax is unusually [illegible] in the Spanish idiom; so well [illegible]he assimilated this speech and [illegible] it his own that one finds no trace [illegible] English accent, no visible sig[illegible] he is not speaking his native [illegible]e. His subtle rhythms smack of [illegible]a. Chromatic elaborations he adds [illegible] lend character and interest, but [illegible] does the decoration take from [illegible]undamental qualities of the piece. [illegible] composer is content with writing [illegible]y music—does not strive to as[illegible]h. Mr. Fiedler's interpretation was [illegible]pathetic, though a less hurried [illegible]ing might have brought out more [illegible]ly the languorous beauty and at[illegible]pheric details of the music.

[illegible]onductor, soloists and orchestra [illegible]ed forces that none of the wit and [illegible]or in Saint-Saens's "Jeux d'esprit" [illegible]uld be slighted. The "Animals" [illegible]sed the audience to the nth degree. [illegible]or is an emotion that is not so [illegible]y portrayed in music. Saint-Saens's [illegible]ful hands have done this admirably. [illegible]srs. Sanroma and Litwin and Mr. [illegible]ze understood perfectly the com[illegible]r's intent. Mr. Sangendoen played [illegible]e Swan" exquisitely.

[illegible]r. Sanroma in Gershwin's "Rhap[illegible]" in Blue," repeated by request, [illegible]wed himself not only a master of [illegible] playing, but an artist who plays [illegible] type of music with the same taste [illegible] fine phrasing he displays in the [illegible]e classical.

[illegible]he symphony was played with vim [illegible] vigor, though at times it lacked [illegible]tety and finesse.

[illegible] large and sympathetic audience ap[illegible]ded enthusiastically.

L. B. D.

[illegible]nts and Sounds Across The Pops

[illegible] always in order to take The [illegible]ghtly, and lightness, in the sum[illegible]mate of Boston, may extend also [illegible]garments that clothe them—more [illegible]larly to those of Mr. Fiedler him[illegible]. For that wise young man, skillful [illegible]ring his way between innovation [illegible]stom, has risked another new de[illegible]e and is setting sartorial example [illegible]ductors who may likewise be em[illegible] on these warm June evenings. [illegible]r has slipped into Symphony Hall [illegible]st night—perhaps on nights be[illegible]Mr. Fiedler met it with well-timed [illegible]lance. That is to say, he has dis[illegible] the evening clothes—with tails—[illegible]ed to be conductorial uniform, [illegible]er the height of the thermometer. [illegible]ay, a blue serge jacket—or was it [illegible]—and white flannel trousers [illegible] him, the "summer" and "infor[illegible]ening dress that, spreading East[illegible]t of the West, is fast becoming [illegible]an habit. (Shall London pre[illegible]our raiment? A thousand times [illegible]n summers the heats of which [illegible]s not!) Mr. Fiedler conducted [illegible]e bodily comfort. The audience [illegible]d him without shock and with [illegible]e, though some among it were [illegible] in the starched and sombre armor he had discarded. The "informal" Pops were at last informal on the stage. "Dulce et decorum est desipere in loco."

There was also new music on the program—three numbers from the "Ballet Borodin," rehearsed and then discarded by Dr. Koussevitzky toward the end of the regular season. The elder Cherepnin, now dwelling in Paris, wrote it; perhaps intended it as "homage" to Borodin, even as he made a Sinfonietta in memory of his master, Rimsky-Korsakov. Yet this "light stuff" seemed a long way from the serious-minded Borodin: while to the non-Russian ear there were few discoverable traces of the folk-idioms that the elder composer cherished. Cherepnin, as in his ballets for Diaghilev, has the Russian instincts toward virtuosity and fancy when light music is in hand. Otherwise this "Ballet Borodin" might have been written by any practised and mild-mannered composer, with a liking for that sort of thing about this time. As it was, no one at Symphony Hall proffered any clew to a baffling title.

At a guess—for there are no program books at The Pops—the first number might have been an introductory revery. The second added Miss Adelle Alberts and Mr. Raymond Simonds to the orchestra to sing "Ah's" in soprano and tenor tones. Perhaps they replaced the chorus, which was to be part of the Koussevitzkian performance; but where this second number stood, or what title it bore, in the scenario of the ballet was beyond guessing—unless it was a Serenade. Finally came a dance. Cherepnin writes a light, polished, transparent music. Into its thin body he washes color neatly and prettily. Over it occasionally he sprinkles the spice of modernist harmony and dissonance—politely and unobtrusively. His rhythms are oftener gentle than incisive—by Russian standards even tame. His vigorous moments, as these excerpts disclosed them, will never offend the nicest taste. . . . Someone in the o[illegible] called it a salon-ballet. He was wrong.

H.

29, 1931.

PULVINO VIOLIN RECITAL TONIGHT

Concertino ..... Huber, Op. 6
Aram Franklin
(2nd Course)

a. Old Black Joe ..... Foster
b. Flow Gently Sweet Afton
English Folk Tune
Francis Lawler
(Preparatory Course)

Rigoletto Fantasie ..... Verdi-Singelee
Victoria Pulvino
(2nd Course)

Concertstuck ..... Portnoff, Op. 14
Carl Boria
(3rd Course)

La Follia, Sonata with a cadenza by Leonard ..... Corelli
Frank Consentino
(4th Course)
at the piano, Gildo Consentino

NOT so very many years ago such a thing as mixing so-called classic music with the popular kind was unthinkable, and justly so, because the popular stuff at that time and for many years before was a pretty feeble thing at its best. But nowadays certain works in the jazz category have found their way through the stately portals of the most sacrosanct concert halls and opera houses, and a few have made quite favorable impressions on their generally discriminating audiences.

Last Sunday evening at the "Pops" [illegible] hall, Boston

es—New York and Boston
Premiere
G TODAY—
ITOL

The Pops

Fifth Week—This summer the Pop Concerts will run through Saturday, July 4. It is now mid-season with them at Symphony Hall, and Mr. Fiedler is freshening the programs as for a new start. On Monday he will bring back the suite of eighteenth-century dances that Mottl drew from Rameau's operas and ballets. Along with it he will repeat Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"—the success of last Sunday's concert—Mr Sanromá will again play the piano-part. On Tuesday, the program runs familiar course, with the Men's Choir of the Square and Compass Club assisting. Four numbers enlarge the list for Wednesday: Tansman's "Transatlantic Sonatina," jazzy with a Foxtrot, a Blues and a Charleston, well-liked withal at last Sunday's Pop; Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta"; the suite of dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker"; a selection from Mr. Kerns's "Show Boat," musically head and shoulders above such pieces.

On Thursday, there is room for the Viennese Strauss-es—Edouard with his "Doctrinen" waltz; Johann with his "Radetzky March." Into Friday's program will go the suite from Cherepnin's "Borodin Ballet," with assisting voices [illegible] Koussevitzky put by toward

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO BE POPS GUEST

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, will direct the final Sunday evening Pop concert of the season, in Symphony Hall, June 21.

JUNE 8, 1931

The distinguished English conductor, who is making his first visit to America this spring, has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts at Hollywood Bowl in California. His appearance in Boston will be his only engagement in the eastern United States. Sir Hamilton is famous as a composer as well as a conductor. He was formerly conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

The present season of Pops has run half its course and continues to draw to Symphony Hall large and enthusiastic audiences that testify to the personal popularity of Mr. Fiedler and to the wisdom of his programmes, that avoid excesses and extremes, whether of light or serious music. For the week to come Mr. Fiedler's lists run true to form. The success of Mr. Sanroma with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," at last Sunday's concert has led to a repetition of that piece, with him as pianist, at the concert of tomorrow evening, and again at that of next Sunday evening.

On Tuesday evening the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club, Warren W. Adams, conductor, will add variety to a programme, replete with popular orchestral numbers. Wednesday will bring a repetition of Tansman's clever assimilation of American jazz, by title, "Sonatine Transatlantique." Similar music from a native source will be heard in a selection from Kern's "Showboat."

Already Mr. Fiedler has reminded his followers that there were other members of the Strauss family besides Johann, by playing Josef Strauss' attractive waltz, "Music of the Spheres." On Thursday evening he will play a waltz by brother Edouard, "Doctrinen," presumably not so profound as its title would suggest. Friday's concert brings the ballet "Borodin," by Tcherepnine, announced by Dr. Koussevitzky for the final Monday Symphony Concert, but withdrawn from the programme at the last moment because, as it was said, the conductor found the music too light in character. At the Pops such an objection would scarcely hold. Before it comes another reminder of the past Symphony season, the "March to the Scaffold," from Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The concert of Saturday evening will, as usual, assemble especial favorites, including on this occasion Ravel's "Bolero."

Concert-Chronicle

Bax's Excursion

NO available records show a previous American performance of Arnold Bax's "Mediterranean," which Arthur Fiedler will introduce at the Pop Concert, Sunday. The Public Library turns up the program of an "all-Bax" concert given in Queen's Hall, London, on November 13, 1922, by such intelligent contemporaries as Harriet Cohen, John Coates, Lionel Tertis, and Eugene Goossens, Mr. Goossens, with his orchestra, chose "Mediterranean" to wind up an evening of "short bits." This piece, originally written for the piano, lasts a bare four minutes. It is dedicated to Gustav Holst.

Eric Bloom, contributing notes to the Bax Program just mentioned, remarked how this sworn Celtic artist turned his attention occasionally, but fleetingly and rather superficially to other climes. His "Traditional Songs of France," some piano fragments with Russian titles, and "Mediterranean," are cases in point.

"'Mediterranean' reveals an entirely new side of Arnold Bax's genius," wrote Eric Bloom, "for he assimilates here a Southern idiom as perfectly in keeping with the subject in hand as it is unexpected in the composer, who goes so far in his geographical precision that we can even locate wtihout the possibility of a mistake the exact part of the Mediterranean he set out to paint. Almost from the first bar we know that he must have been thinking of the Spanish coast."

This surmise is born out by the music's triple rhythm, rubato, which might be a seguidilla from Bizet or Albeniz. The castanets and tambourine clinch the theory, as do the accompanying violins, "quasi mandolino." It is a lilting and langorous music, quite in accord, if the truth must be told, with the northern tourist's idea of what should go with Spanish moonlight. The lesson is long since learned that Spanish music produced beyond the Pyrenees lacks the native vividness and wild tang. Let your foreigner speak frankly in his own language, even in the borrowed rhythm, and he may be forgiven. So Bax, with his delicate color, his half-lights, his subtle command of detail, lifts this piece shoulders above a hundred others of little consequence. The composer makes no attempt to set the world on fire—it is sometimes enough to content the ears of some of it for a short space. Bax seems to realize with Delius, Vaughan Williams and other Englishmen that a charming and an unassuming interlude of three or four minutes' length can be eminently useful in the laying out of orchestral programs.

"Request Night"

For next Wednesday evening at The Pops Mr. Fiedler proposed a "Request Program." By report from Symphony Hall, the balloting was uncommonly heavy. For the most part, it ran to "old favorites," with Ravel's "Bolero," Grainger's "Country-Garden" and the movie waltz, from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," for additions out of the present day. "Bolero," it appears, received twice as many votes as any other piece, from which sign of the times the purists in music and morals may infer—what they will. Here is the program as the conductor finally adjusted it:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Liebestraum ..... Liszt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony ..... Chaikovsky
First Suite from the Music to "Peer Gynt," ..... Grieg
Largo ..... Handel
Bolero ..... Ravel
Waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time" ..... Stolz
Country Garden ..... Grainger
Waltz, "Blue Danube" ..... Joh. Strauss

The "encore pieces," also chosen by vote, will be:

Tango, "Jalousie" ..... Gade
Humoresque ..... Dvorák
Hungarian Dance, No. 5 ..... Brahms
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann." ..... Offenbach
Flight of the Bee ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

All of which is quite natural and understandable, save the passion for that mediocre movie-waltz—and with the "Blue Danube" on the same program!—or the neglect of Mr. Gershwin, whom Mr. Fiedler has deservingly cultivated these six weeks.

Mr. Stokowski Catches Up

Emerging from Russia, where he was questing for novel music, Mr. Stokowski heard in Berlin for the first time of the Fascist affronts in Bologna and Milan to Mr. Toscannini. He expressed himself warmly on the subject and entirely in sympathy with the abused conductor. Mr. Stokowski has no high opinion of political hymnology at symphony concerts. "You might as well expect a painter to wave flags before the pictures in an art gallery," he told the correspondent of the Herald Tribune. "There is no place for politics in the concert-hall."

olyoke Alumnae

n, Charleston, S. C.

iation for next year. She was Miss Pope, '04.

twenty-fifth year of the class of Father McHugh, dean of the college, who delivered the baccalaureate address last evening.

N. U. Senior Week Will Begin Tonight

Northeastern's senior week activities commence tonight, when the faculty-alumni reception to the senior classes of the school of engineering and school of business administration will take place at the University Club. The feature of the program will be a one-act collegiate farce, "The Lady Collects," written by Edward R. Place.

The student cast includes three impersonators of feminine roles: Harry M. Tracy, '34, West Somerville, as Natalie Sinclair; William T. Schafer, '31, West Roxbury, Eleanor Stevens, and Stephen Haseltine, Jr., '31, Stoneham, Richard Thayer. The first two will be prom girls, while Haseltine has the star role as a collegian masquerading as a prom girl. The collegians are portrayed by Robert I. [illegible] humor and dry fancy. [illegible] Bevans

By these qualities what was originally a chamber-piece for private performance among intimates persists in a semi-serious concert across Symphony Hall. The elephants do their parody of Berlioz's "Dance of the Sylphs"; Mr. Vondrak at the double-bass plays for them; and we are all amused. Saint-Saëns discloses a marvellous observation and intuition of the henyard, and these orchestral cluckings are uncanny to hear. Pianists are mockingly tossed into the menagerie; the whole orchestra cannot check their showy pretentions. The lions parade and roar in travesty. Or the finale would have the animals as gods à la Offenbach. Yet there are subtleties with the tortoises; finesse with the darting fish—"Aquarium" was omitted last evening; a pretty fancy with the cuckoo; while what else can "The Swan" be nowadays but elegy for Anna Pavlova departed? Saint-Saëns was amusing himself when he wrote this jeu d'esprit. Unlike much other music with which composers have diverted themselves, it also diverts audiences. But he could hardly have suspected that

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Kammenoi Ostrow ..... Rubinstein
The Old Refrain ..... Kreisler
Overture to the Operetta, "Orpheus in the Underworld" ..... Offenbach
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Faust" ..... Gounod
Rachem ..... Mana-Zucca
Overture, "The Year 1812" ..... Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" ..... Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
March, "On the Mall" ..... Goldman

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Music

Sunday Pops

Last night in Symphony Hall a Sunday evening Pop program of more than passing interest was played. Beginning with the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Mr. Fiedler set upon the program also the piquant "Mediterranean" by Arnold Bax, Saint-Saëns's amusing "Animals' Carnival" with Mr. Vondrak playing the solo double-bass, Mr. Langendoen the solo cello and Messrs. Sanromá and Litvin at the pianos. By popular request the program closed with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" with Mr. Sanromá soloist.

Again one records a capacity house, and genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm for the music heard. Of the Tchaikovsky Mr. Fiedler made an interesting vest pocket edition, although to ears unaccustomed to the larger sonorities of the symphony orchestra in full complement, the performance must have been extremely effective, since the audience recalled Mr. Fiedler a number of times and would not be quiet until he had "stood his men."

With the Bax trifle one may mention rhythms not too insistent, Spanish, orchestration not too complicated, yet effective, harmonies modern in content and pleasant to hear. A piece given somewhat to understatement for effect, and therefore dependent upon finesse in performance. After the tremendous music of Tchaikovsky, one found it difficult to make the necessary adjustment in listening, a difficulty no doubt experienced by most of the audience; yet despite the wide divergence in musical content, the piece was well received and applauded heartily.

But it was to the "Animals" that the audience last night lost its heart, so to speak. Seldom is the reviewer accorded the privilege of listening both to the audience and the orchestra. Last night, the humorous qualities were not only brought well to the front, but the audience also found it good to chuckle and laugh in refreshingly juvenile manner. The hall echoed to the laughter occasioned by the "Cocks and Hens" and "Persons with long ears." To Mr. Vondrak was accorded loud applause at conclusion of his double-bass solo. Nor were the "Pianists" overlooked in general joy of the occasion, while Mr. Langendoen was paid the compliment of that quiet and concentrated attention for which the soloist always hopes. Conductor and men received an ovation at the conclusion of the suite.

Having been served the "Rhapsody in Blue" on a previous occasion, one is tempted to question if it be the Rhapsody itself or the admirable Mr. Sanromá which necessitates the repetition. Whichever may be the case, the performance last night again justified the inclusion of the piece and brought to amore or less tumultuous close one more Sunday evening at Pops.

G. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Third Sunday Pop Concert

Arnold Bax' "Mediterranean" which received its first performance in Boston; Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony; Sain-Saen's "Carnival of the Animals" and George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" made up the program of the third Sunday evening pop concert of this season. Jesus M. Sanroma and Leo Litwin were the piano soloists in the Saint-Saens' music. Mr Sanroma played with his usual dash and spirit the solo part in the "Rhapsody."

The symphony was well played without much subtlety in minute details. There were occasions when the accompanying inner voices stood out too prominently. In this particular symphony, which to one person is the poorest of three best known Tchaikovsky symphonies, this latter deficiency reveals glaringly the tawdriness of the manipulation and the banality of much of the thematic material. Mr Fiedler followed the letter of the score in the second movement, however, and played the part "Allegro con grazia" and not "Andante." Would that there were more conductors as faithful. If one considers this movement it is improved when retarded in pace.

"Mediterranean" was a sort of [illegible] fied dance piece, and apparently revealed the composer's "impressions" of some part of the Mediterranean. Langorous melody, a sort of [illegible] rhythm, and the use of castanets presumably indicated the Spanish coast. The piece is very short, quite without point, and utterly inconsequential, but is a pleasant and agreeable trifle. It ought to find welcome on the regular Pops programs as a charming interlude.

Little need be said of the performance of the "Rhapsody." Conductor, soloists and orchestra are unusually successful with it, and so it was this evening.

THE POPS

The program for the third Pops Sunday evening Symphony concert yesterday in Symphony hall was the following: Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor; Bax, "Mediterranean"; Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival" (S. Mr. Sanroma and Leo Litwin, pianists) Gershwin, "Rhapsody in Blue." For those whose serious trend of mind extends even into warm weather there was the "Pathetic" symphony; the rest of the program was in a lighter vein.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the first Boston performance of Bax "Mediterranean." The composition, originally written for the piano, is not long; one rather wishes it was, for it seems a pity that anything as charming should last so short a time. Mr. Bax is unusually happy in the Spanish idiom; so well has he assimilated this speech and made it his own that one finds no trace of an English accent, no visible sign that he is not speaking his native tongue. His subtle rhythms smack of Iberia. Chromatic elaborations he adds that lend character and interest, but never does the decoration take from the fundamental qualities of the piece. The composer is content with writing lovely music—does not strive to astonish. Mr. Fiedler's interpretation was sympathetic, though a less hurried reading might have brought out more clearly the languorous beauty and atmospheric details of the music.

Conductor, soloists and orchestra joined forces that none of the wit and humor in Saint-Saens's "Jeux d'esprit" should be slighted. The "Animals" amused the audience to the nth degree. Humor is an emotion that is not so easily portrayed in music. Saint-Saens's skillful hands have done this admirably. Messrs. Sanroma and Litwin and Mr. Kunze understood perfectly the composer's intent. Mr. Sangendoen played "The Swan" exquisitely.

Mr. Sanroma in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," repeated by request, showed himself not only a master of jazz playing, but an artist who plays this type of music with the same taste and fine phrasing he displays in the more classical.

The symphony was played with vim and vigor, though at times it lacked subtlety and finesse.

A large and sympathetic audience applauded enthusiastically. L. B. D.

Sights and Sounds Across The Pops

It is always in order to take The Pops lightly, and lightness, in the summer climate of Boston, may extend also to the garments that clothe them—more particularly to those of Mr. Fiedler himself. For that wise young man, skillful in steering his way between innovation and custom, has risked another new departure and is setting sartorial example to conductors who may likewise be employed on these warm June evenings. Summer has slipped into Symphony Hall, and last night—perhaps on nights before—Mr. Fiedler met it with well-timed nonchalance. That is to say, he has discarded the evening clothes—with tails—presumed to be conductorial uniform, whatever the height of the thermometer. Yesterday, a blue serge jacket—or was it black?—and white flannel trousers clothed him, the "summer" and "informal" evening dress that, spreading Eastward out of the West, is fast becoming American habit. (Shall London prescribe our raiment? A thousand times "No," in summers the heats of which it knows not!) Mr. Fiedler conducted in more bodily comfort. The audience observed him without shock and with pleasure, though some among it were encased in the starched and sombre armor he had discarded. The "informal" Pops were at last informal on the stage. "Dulce et decorum est desipere in loco."

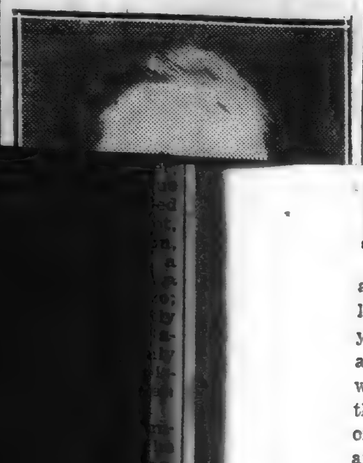
There was also new music on the program—three numbers from the "Ballet Borodin," rehearsed and then discarded by Dr. Koussevitzky toward the end of the regular season. The elder Cherepnin, now dwelling in Paris, wrote it: perhaps intended it as "homage" to Borodin, even as he made a Sinfonietta in memory of his master, Rimsky-Korsakov. Yet this "light stuff" seemed a long way from the serious-minded Borodin: while to the non-Russian ear there were few discoverable traces of the folk-idioms that the elder composer cherished. Cherepnin, as in his ballets for Diaghilev, has the Russian instincts toward virtuosity and fancy when light music is in hand. Otherwise this "Ballet Borodin" might have been written by any practised and mild-mannered composer, with a liking for that sort of thing about this time. As it was, no one at Symphony Hall proffered any clew to a baffling title.

At a guess—for there are no program-books at The Pops—the first number might have been an introductory revery. The second added Miss Adelle Alberts and Mr. Raymond Simonds to the orchestra to sing "Ah's" in soprano and tenor tones. Perhaps they replaced the chorus, which was to be part of the Koussevitzkian performance; but where this second number stood, or what title it bore, in the scenario of the ballet was beyond guessing—unless it was a Serenade. Finally came a dance. Cherepnin writes a light, polished, transparent music. Into its thin body he washes color neatly and prettily. Over it occasionally he sprinkles the spice of modernist harmony and dissonance—politely and unobtrusively. His rhythms are oftener gentle than incisive—by Russian standards even tame. His vigorous moments, as these excerpts disclosed them, will never offend the nicest taste. . . . Someone in the offing called it a salon-ballet. He was not far wrong.

H. T. P.

29, 1931.

PULVINO VIOLIN RECITAL TONIGHT



Concertino	Huber, Op. 6
Aram Franklin (2nd Course)
a. Old Black Joe	Foster
b. Flow Gently Sweet Afton	English Folk Tune
Francis Lawler (Preparatory Course)
Rigoletto Fantasie	Verdi-Singelee
Victoria Pulvino (2nd Course)
Concertstuck	Portnoff, Op. 14
Carl Boria (3rd Course)
La Follia. Sonata with a cadenza by Leonard	Corelli
Frank Consentino (4th Course)
at the piano, Gildo Consentino

NOT so very many years ago such a thing as mixing so-called classic music with the popular kind was unthinkable, and justly so, because the popular stuff at that time and for many years before was a pretty feeble thing at its best. But nowadays certain works in the jazz category have found their way through the stately portals of the most sacrosanct concert halls and opera houses, and a few have made quite favorable impressions on their generally discriminating audiences.

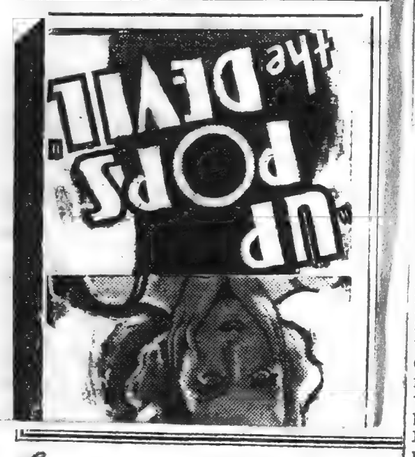
Last Sunday evening at the "Pops" [illegible] Hall, Boston

es—New York and Boston

Premiere

G TODAY—

ITOL



The Pops

Fifth Week—This summer the Pop Concerts will run through Saturday, July 4. It is now mid-season with them at Symphony Hall, and Mr. Fiedler is freshening the programs as for a new start. On Monday he will bring back the suite of eighteenth-century dances that Mottl drew from Rameau's operas and ballets. Along with it he will repeat Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"—the success of last Sunday's concert—Mr. Sanromá will again play the piano-part. On Tuesday, the program runs familiar course, with the Men's Choir of the Square and Compass Club assisting. Four numbers enlarge the list for Wednesday: Tansman's "Transatlantic Sonatina," jazzy with a Foxtrot, a Blues and a Charleston, well-liked withal at last Sunday's Pop; Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta"; the suite of dances from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker"; a selection from Mr. Kerns's "Show Boat," musically head and shoulders above such pieces.

On Thursday, there is room for the Viennese Strauss-es—Edouard with his "Doctrinen" waltz; Johann with his "Radetzky March." Into Friday's program will go the suite from Cherepnin's "Borodin Ballet," with assisting voices [illegible] Koussevitzky put by toward

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO BE POPS GUEST

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Hallé Orchestra of Manchester, England, will direct the final Sunday evening Pop concert of the season, in Symphony Hall, June 21.

JUNE 8, 1931

The distinguished English conductor, who is making his first visit to America this spring, has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts at Hollywood Bowl in California. His appearance in Boston will be his only engagement in the eastern United States. Sir Hamilton is famous as a composer as well as a conductor. He was formerly conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTH WEEK OF POPS

The present season of Pops has run half its course and continues to draw to Symphony Hall large and enthusiastic audiences that testify to the personal popularity of Mr. Fiedler and to the wisdom of his programmes, that avoid excesses and extremes, whether of light or serious music. For the week to come Mr. Fiedler's lists run true to form. The success of Mr. Sanroma with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," at last Sunday's concert has led to a repetition of that piece, with him as pianist, at the concert of tomorrow evening, and again at that of next Sunday evening.

On Tuesday evening the chorus of the Boston Square and Compass Club, Warren W. Adams, conductor, will add variety to a programme, replete with popular orchestral numbers. Wednesday will bring a repetition of Tansman's clever assimilation of American jazz, by title, "Sonatine Transatlantique." Similar music from a native source will be heard in a selection from Kern's "Showboat."

Already Mr. Fiedler has reminded his followers that there were other members of the Strauss family besides Johann, by playing Josef Strauss' attractive waltz, "Music of the Spheres." On Thursday evening he will play a waltz by brother Edouard, "Doctrinen," presumably not so profound as its title would suggest. Friday's concert brings the ballet "Borodin," by Tcherepnine, announced by Dr. Koussevitzky for the final Monday Symphony Concert, but withdrawn from the programme at the last moment because, as it was said, the conductor found the music too light in character. At the Pops such an objection would scarcely hold. Before it comes another reminder of the past Symphony season, the "March to the Scaffold," from Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The concert of Saturday evening will, as usual, assemble especial favorites, including on this occasion Ravel's "Bolero."

Concert-Chronicle

Bax's Excursion

NO available records show a previous American performance of Arnold Bax's "Mediterranean," which Arthur Fiedler will introduce at the Pop Concert, Sunday. The Public Library turns up the program of an "all-Bax" concert given in Queen's Hall, London, on November 13, 1922, by such intelligent contemporaries as Harriet Cohen, John Coates, Lionel Tertis, and Eugene Goossens, Mr. Goossens, with his orchestra, chose "Mediterranean" to wind up an evening of "short bits." This piece, originally written for the piano, lasts a bare four minutes. It is dedicated to Gustav Holst.

Eric Bloom, contributing notes to the Bax Program just mentioned, remarked how this sworn Celtic artist turned his attention occasionally, but fleetingly and rather superficially to other climes. His "Traditional Songs of France," some piano fragments with Russian titles, and "Mediterranean," are cases in point.

"'Mediterranean' reveals an entirely new side of Arnold Bax's genius," wrote Eric Bloom, "for he assimilates here a Southern idiom as perfectly in keeping with the subject in hand as it is unexpected in the composer, who goes so far in his geographical precision that we can even locate wtihout the possibility of a mistake the exact part of the Mediterranean he set out to paint. Almost from the first bar we know that he must have been thinking of the Spanish coast."

This surmise is born out by the music's triple rhythm, rubato, which might be a seguidilla from Bizet or Albeniz. The castanets and tambourine clinch the theory, as do the accompanying violins. "quasi mandolino." It is a lilting and langorous music, quite in accord, if the truth must be told, with the northern tourist's idea of what should go with Spanish moonlight. The lesson is long since learned that Spanish music produced beyond the Pyrenees lacks the native vividness and wild tang. Let your foreigner speak frankly in his own language, even in the borrowed rhythm, and he may be forgiven. So Bax, with his delicate color, his half-lights, his subtle command of detail, lifts this piece shoulders above a hundred others of little consequence. The composer makes no attempt to set the world on fire—it is sometimes enough to content the ears of some of it for a short space. Bax seems to realize with Delius, Vaughan Williams and other Englishmen that a charming and an unassuming interlude of three or four minutes' length can be eminently useful in the laying out of orchestral programs.

"Request Night"

For next Wednesday evening at The Pops Mr. Fiedler proposed a "Request Program." By report from Symphony Hall, the balloting was uncommonly heavy. For the most part, it ran to "old favorites," with Ravel's "Bolero," Grainger's "Country-Garden" and the movie waltz, from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time," for additions out of the present day. "Bolero," it appears, received twice as many votes as any other piece, from which sign of the times the purists in music and morals may infer—what they will. Here is the program as the conductor finally adjusted it:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Liebestraum	Liszt
Finale from the Fourth Symphony	Chaikovsky
First Suite from the Music to "Peer Gynt."	Grieg
Largo	Handel
Bolero	Ravel
Waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time"	Stolz
Country Garden	Grainger
Waltz, "Blue Danube"	Joh. Strauss

The "encore pieces," also chosen by vote, will be:

Tango, "Jalousie"	Gade
Humoresque	Dvorák
Hungarian Dance, No. 5	Brahms
Barcarolle from "The Tales of Hoffmann."	Offenbach
Flight of the Bee	Rimsky-Korsakov

All of which is quite natural and understandable, save the passion for that mediocre movie-waltz—and with the "Blue Danube" on the same program!—or the neglect of Mr. Gershwin, whom Mr. Fiedler has deservingly cultivated these six weeks.

Mr. Stokowski Catches Up

Emerging from Russia, where he was questing for novel music, Mr. Stokowski heard in Berlin for the first time of the Fascist affronts in Bologna and Milan to Mr. Toscannini. He expressed himself warmly on the subject and entirely in sympathy with the abused conductor. Mr. Stokowski has no high opinion of political hymnology at symphony concerts. "You might as well expect a painter to wave flags before the pictures in an art gallery," he told the correspondent of the Herald Tribune. "There is no place for politics in the concert-hall."

olyoke Alumnae

in, Charleston, S. C.

ciation for next year. She was Miss Pope, '04.

twenty-fifth year of the class of Father McHugh, dean of the college, who delivered the baccalaureate address last evening.

N. U. Senior Week Will Begin Tonight

Northeastern's senior week activities commence tonight, when the faculty-alumni reception to the senior classes of the school of engineering and school of business administration will take place at the University Club. The feature of the program will be a one-act collegiate farce, "The Lady Collects," written by Edward R. Place.

The student cast includes three impersonators of feminine roles: Harry M. Tracy, '34, West Somerville, as Natalie Sinclair; William T. Schafer, '31, West Roxbury, Eleanor Stevens, and Stephen Haseltine, Jr., '31, Stoneham, Richard Thayer. The first two will be prom girls, while Haseltine has the star role as a collegian masquerading as a prom girl. The collegians are portrayed by Robert I. [illegible] Bevans. Humor and dry fancy.

By these qualities what was originally a chamber-piece for private performance among intimates persists in a semi-serious concert across Symphony Hall. The elephants do their parody of Berlioz's "Dance of the Sylphs"; Mr. Vondrak at the double-bass plays for them; and we are all amused. Saint-Saëns discloses a marvellous observation and intuition of the henyard, and these orchestral cluckings are uncanny to hear. Pianists are mockingly tossed into the menagerie; the whole orchestra cannot check their showy pretentions. The lions parade and roar in travesty. Or the finale would have the animals as gods à la Offenbach. Yet there are subtleties with the tortoises; finesse with the darting fish—"Aquarium" was omitted last evening; a pretty fancy with the cuckoo; while what else can "The Swan" be nowadays but elegy for Anna Pavlova departed? Saint-Saëns was amusing himself when he wrote this jeu d'esprit. Unlike much other music with which composers have diverted themselves, it also diverts audiences. But he could hardly have suspected that

At The Pops Tonight

Wedding March from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" — Mendelssohn
Kammenoi Ostrow — Rubinstein
The Old Refrain — Kreisler
Overture to the Operetta, "Orpheus in the Underworld" — Offenbach
Ballet Music from the Opera, "Faust" — Gounod
Rachem — Mana-Zucca
Overture, "The Year 1812" — Chaikovsky
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon" — Romberg
Waltz, "Estudiantina" — Waldteufel
March, "On the Mall" — Goldman

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Music

Sunday Pops

Last night in Symphony Hall a Sunday evening Pop program of more than passing interest was played. Beginning with the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Mr. Fiedler set upon the program also the piquant "Mediterranean" by Arnold Bax, Saint-Saëns's amusing "Animals' Carnival" with Mr. Vondrak playing the solo double-bass, Mr. Langendoen the solo cello and Messrs. Sanromá and Litvin at the pianos. By popular request the program closed with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" with Mr. Sanromá soloist.

Again one records a capacity house, and genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm for the music heard. Of the Tchaikovsky Mr. Fiedler made an interesting vest pocket edition, although to ears unaccustomed to the larger sonorities of the symphony orchestra in full complement, the performance must have been extremely effective, since the audience recalled Mr. Fiedler a number of times and would not be quiet until he had "stood his men."

With the Bax trifle one may mention rhythms not too insistently Spanish, orchestration not too complicated, yet effective, harmonies modern in content and pleasant to hear. A piece given somewhat to understatement for effect, and therefore dependent upon finesse in performance. After the tremendous music of Tchaikovsky, one found it difficult to make the necessary adjustment in listening, a difficulty no doubt experienced by most of the audience; yet despite the wide divergence in musical content, the piece was well received and applauded heartily.

But it was to the "Animals" that the audience last night lost its heart, so to speak. Seldom is the reviewer accorded the privilege of listening both to the audience and the orchestra. Last night, the humorous qualities were not only brought well to the front, but the audience also found it good to chuckle and laugh in refreshingly juvenile manner. The hall echoed to the laughter occasioned by the "Cocks and Hens" and "Personages with long ears." To Mr. Vondrak was accorded loud applause at the conclusion of his double-bass solo. Nor were the "Pianists" overlooked in the general joy of the occasion, while Mr. Langendoen was paid the compliment of that quiet and concentrated attention for which the soloist always hopes. Conductor and men received an ovation at the conclusion of the suite.

Having been served the "Rhapsody in Blue" on a previous occasion, one is tempted to question if it be the Rhapsody itself or the admirable Mr. Sanromá which necessitates the repetition. Whichever may be the case, the performance last night again justified the inclusion of the piece and brought to amore or less tumultuous close one more Sunday evening at Pops.

G. M. S.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

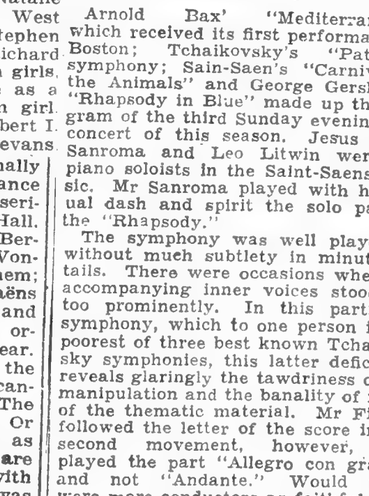
Third Sunday Pop Concert

Arnold Bax' "Mediterranean", which received its first performance in Boston; Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony; Sain-Saen's "Carnival of the Animals" and George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" made up the program of the third Sunday evening Pop concert of this season. Jesus Maria Sanroma and Leo Litwin were the piano soloists in the Saint-Saens' music. Mr Sanroma played with his usual dash and spirit the solo part in the "Rhapsody."

The symphony was well played, if without much subtlety in minute details. There were occasions when the accompanying inner voices stood out too prominently. In this particular symphony, which to one person is the poorest of three best known Tchaikovsky symphonies, this latter deficiency reveals glaringly the tawdriness of the manipulation and the banality of much of the thematic material. Mr Fiedler followed the letter of the score in the second movement, however, and played the part "Allegro con grazia" and not "Andante." Would there were more conductors as faithful even if one considers this movement rather improved when retarded in pace.

"Mediterranean" was a sort of glorified dance piece, and apparently revealed the composer's "impressions" of some part of the Mediterranean. Langorous melody, a sort of tango rhythm, and the use of castanets presumably indicated the Spanish coast. The piece is very short, quite without point, and utterly inconsequential, yet is a pleasant and agreeable trifle. It ought to find welcome on the regular Pops programs as a charming interlude.

Little need be said of the performance of the "Rhapsody." Conductor, soloists and orchestra are unusually successful with it, and so it was last evening.



Music

Sunday Pops

Last night in Symphony Hall a Sunday evening Pop program of more than passing interest was played. Beginning with the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Mr. Fiedler set upon the program also the piquant "Mediterranean" by Arnold Bax, Saint-Saëns's amusing "Animals' Carnival" with Mr. Vondrak playing the solo double-bass, Mr. Langendoen the solo cello and Messrs. Sanromá and Litvin at the pianos. By popular request the program closed with Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" with Mr. Sanromá soloist.

Again one records a capacity house, and genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm for the music heard. Of the Tchaikovsky Mr. Fiedler made an interesting vest pocket edition, although to ears unaccustomed to the larger sonorities of the symphony orchestra in full complement, the performance must have been extremely effective, since the audience recalled Mr. Fiedler a number of times and would not be quiet until he had "stood his men."

With the Bax trifle one may mention rhythms not too insistently Spanish, orchestration not too complicated, yet effective, harmonies modern in content and pleasant to hear. A piece given somewhat to understatement for effect, and therefore dependent upon finesse in performance. After the tremendous music of Tchaikovsky, one found it difficult to make the necessary adjustment in listening, a difficulty no doubt experienced by most of the audience; yet despite the wide divergence in musical content, the piece was well received and applauded heartily.

But it was to the "Animals" that the audience last night lost its heart, so to speak. Seldom is the reviewer accorded the privilege of listening both to the audience and the orchestra. Last night, the humorous qualities were not only brought well to the front, but the audience also found it good to chuckle and laugh in refreshingly juvenile manner. The hall echoed to the laughter occasioned by the "Cocks and Hens" and "Personages with long ears." To Mr. Vondrak was accorded loud applause at the conclusion of his double-bass solo. Nor were the "Pianists" overlooked in the general joy of the occasion, while Mr. Langendoen was paid the compliment of that quiet and concentrated attention for which the soloist always hopes. Conductor and men received an ovation at the conclusion of the suite.

Having been served the "Rhapsody in Blue" on a previous occasion, one is tempted to question if it be the Rhapsody itself or the admirable Mr. Sanromá which necessitates the repetition. Whichever may be the case, the performance last night again justified the inclusion of the piece and brought to amore or less tumultuous close one more Sunday evening at Pops.

G. M. S.

THE POPS

The program for the third Pops Sunday evening Symphony concert yesterday in Symphony hall was the following: Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor; Bax, "Mediterranean"; Saint-[illegible] "Animals' Carnival" (S. M[illegible] and Leo Litwin, pianists); "Rhapsody in Blue." For [illegible] serious trend of mind ex[illegible] into warm weather there [illegible] athetic" symphony; the rest [illegible] ram was in a lighter vein.

[illegible] conducted the first Bos[illegible] mance of Bax "Mediterran[illegible] composition, originally writ[illegible] piano, is not long; one ra[illegible] it was, for it seems a pity [illegible] sing as charming should last [illegible] time. Mr. Bax is unusually [illegible] the Spanish idiom; so well [illegible] assimilated this speech and [illegible] own that one finds no trace [illegible] glish accent, no visible sig[illegible] is not speaking his native [illegible] his subtle rhythms smack of [illegible] romatic elaborations he adds [illegible] character and interest, but [illegible] ass the decoration take from [illegible] mental qualities of the piece. [illegible] ser is content with writing [illegible]—does not strive to as[illegible] Fiedler's interpretation was [illegible] though a less hurried [illegible] have brought out more [illegible] languorous beauty and at[illegible] details of the music.

[illegible] soloists and orchestra [illegible] that none of the wit and Saint-Saens's "Jeux d'esprit" [illegible] slighted. The "Animals" [illegible] audience to the nth degree. [illegible] an emotion that is not so[illegible] trayed in music. Saint-Saens's [illegible] ands have done this admirably. [illegible] Sanroma and Litwin and Mr. [illegible] nderstood perfectly the com[illegible] ntent. Mr. Sangendoen played [illegible] van" exquisitely.

[illegible] anroma in Gershwin's "Rhap[illegible] Blue," repeated by request, [illegible] himself not only a master of [illegible] aying, but an artist who plays [illegible] e of music with the same taste [illegible] me phrasing he displays in the more [illegible] lassical.

[illegible] ymphony was played with vim [illegible] r, though at times it lacked [illegible] nd finesse.

[illegible] nd sympathetic audience ap[illegible] husiastically. L. B. D.

to sell. For particulars [illegible] ley 0246, 1700; evenings [illegible] wton 2859-W.

NOVER, MASS.
te with fine old shade trees [illegible] use; large stable; modern con[illegible] s of good land; property i[illegible] Estate should be seen to real[illegible] very reasonable. For appoint[illegible] r 80.
. C. DUMAS
NOVER, MASS.

ESLEY HILLS
BRICK COTTAGE
HTFULLY IN GARDEN
es. Concentrated conven[illegible] Fine section.
ROAD, WEL lesley 1821
je 6

ONEHAM
7-room Colonial house, sun[illegible] ng room, built-in bookcases, electric refrigeration, finished [illegible] 00 ft. land. Fine residential [illegible] 3,500 two years ago. Has [illegible] Only $8500 if sold this week. [illegible] E. 521 Main St., Stoneham. [illegible] 0477. (ros) (2767B)

VTONVILLE
new 2-family house, 6 and 6 [illegible] eer, open fireplace, gumwood [illegible] ling; tiled kitchen and baths; [illegible] age; 11,000 feet land; near [illegible] school. Open Sundays, 2 to 6 [illegible] NAGAN, Owner and Builder. (ros) SWS; je 6

OR SALE
IN MILTON
arkway. Colonial type house [illegible] aths, sun room, Laundry and [illegible] l be sold for less than present [illegible] on. If you want a real good [illegible] look this over; for appoint[illegible] n 0445. (ros)

ON BEACON STREET
OOKLINE
ROOMS, large reception hall, [illegible] a oil heater, furnished or un[illegible] ss zone. Address F.F.O., [illegible] . (ros) (2730B)

2-Story House
three stairways, bathroom, [illegible] e piazza and balcony; garage [illegible] e heated. Large shade trees, [illegible] situated on Daniel Webster [illegible] on, N. H. Good location for [illegible] SMITH, Owner. (ros) (2719B)

EST MEDFORD
h Colonial, sun parlor, gum[illegible] heat, 2-car garage. Desirable [illegible] ystic Lakes, within 5 minutes' [illegible] edford Station. Tel. ARL ing[illegible] (ros) (4157L) room single house, tiled bath, [illegible] n parlor; near Commonwealth [illegible] low. 80 East Bourne Rd. Tel. 2764-R. (ros) (16721) ged to offer this very fine 2[illegible] h land, corner lot, landscaped [illegible] brook, gold-fish pond, vines, [illegible] ficent shade trees, fruit. House [illegible] thoroughly renovated and ar[illegible] d. Every convenience; thermo[illegible] led oil burner, 2 large fire[illegible] fine residential neighborhood [illegible] to depot, stores, boating and [illegible] ably priced at $20,000; terms [illegible] ODY, 42 Commercial St., East [illegible] ymouth Landing. BRA intrec (ros)

TON CENTRE

TON BRICK
USE, six rooms and bath, first floor. Sun parlor and Two-car garage. Near Ave. Price $14,800.
CALLANAN COMPANY
ington St., Newton
W ton North 2110
(ros)

VTON, $10,500

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO CONDUCT POPS

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished English conductor, is to visit Boston and take over a Pop concert, according to a cable received at Symphony hall from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in England.

The invitation was made at the suggestion of Arthur Fiedler, who has long admired Sir Hamilton Harty, and has introduced his arrangement of "A Londonderry Air" at the Pops. The distinguished English musician is about to make his first trip to America as conductor. He has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts in the Hollywood bowl in July. When he leads the last of the Sunday Pop concerts in Symphony hall on June 21, he will make his only appearance in the eastern United States.

Sir Hamilton Harty has been the famous conductor since 1920 of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, with which he gives an annual series in London. Born in Hillsborough, Ireland, in 1879, he became church organist in County Antrim at the age of 12. He has had a long and distinguished career as accompanist, as composer, and as arranger of Irish folk songs and other music. He won his first high fame as conductor during the seasons in which he led the London Symphony orchestra.

POPS TONIGHT

Arthur Fiedler will lead the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight.

Le Coq d'Or, wedding march ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
London Symphony, minuet ..... Haydn
Largo ..... Handel
Tales from Johann Strauss ..... Korngold
Aida, Fantasia ..... Verdi
Oberon, overture ..... Weber
Streets of Pekin, suite ..... Hadley
(Conducted by the composer)
Mlle. Modiste, selection ..... Herbert
Jalousie, tango ..... Gade
Lohengrin, introduction to Act III. Wagner

Concert-Crier

TRANS. June 13

The Pops

Seventh Week—The event of next week at The Pops falls at the end of it—the coming of Sir Hamilton Harty, the noted conductor of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester and London to be guest-leader at the "Sunday Pop" of June 21. Elsewhere in these pages is an article [illegible] and its sp

S n n w d
p
T
C

F

Assembling Background For a Guest

From a Renowned Orchestra Comes Hamilton Harty To Symphony Hall

Trans. June 13

ON Sunday, June 21, the Pops Concerts at Symphony Hall will be honored as signally as ever a concert in regular winter course is honored. At that time one of the outstanding conductors of the British Isles will appear for the first time before an American orchestra and an American audience. That evening Sir Hamilton Harty, since 1920 conductor of the famous Hallé orchestra of Manchester, England, and now on the way to a summer of conducting on our own Pacific Coast, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the entire evening's program.

In England the Hallé orchestra has been served through two long terms by two illustrious conductors, Sir Charles Hallé and Hans Richter of Wagnerian fame. To these two Sir Hamilton Harty is a worthy successor. The Hallé concerts themselves are an outgrowth of an older organization at Manchester known as the "Gentlemen's Concerts." These concerts in turn were founded in 1745, which the historically minded will remember was while Handel was still alive and active —very active—in England, in fact only three years after he wrote his "Messiah."

In 1848 a German musician who had lived in Paris for a dozen years as an intimate of the brilliant group of musicians (Chopin, Kalkbrenner, etc.) then residing there, found it advisable because of the revolutionary disturbances of February of that year, to flee France and to settle in England. He had visited England five years earlier. Now he sought refuge in Manchester. His name was Karl Hallé (born Hagen, Westphalia, Germany, 1819). When fame came his way in his new English home he was Charles (after 1888 Sir Charles) Hallé. After two years' residence in Manchester, in recognition of his sound musicianship, he was made conductor of the "Gentlemen's Concerts."

In 1857 Hallé gathered a notable orchestra to play at an important exhibition in Manchester. Soon he was seeking the financial support that would make this orchestra permanent. And from the following year (1858) the new orchestra began to give regular concerts. Thus the origin of the Hallé orchestra. Until 1911 it shared its conductors with the "Gentlemen's Concerts." At that time the latter made an attempt for independence by engaging Sir Henry Wood as their own individual conductor. But with the outbreak of the Great War these concerts were abandoned never to be resumed. Meanwhile the Hallé concerts continued to flourish.

Hallé himself was a pianist and ensemble player as well as conductor of great repute. He instituted a notable series of piano concerts at his own home, playing at one group of such concerts the entire list of Beethoven's sonatas. He was much in demand throughout England as pianist in various combinations of chamber music. And of no course no less as conductor.

After Sir Charles Hallé's death in 1895 the orchestra which he had called into being and which had been his very own for thirty-seven years, suffered a season of guest conductors; played under Frederick Cowen as temporary conductor until 1899; in that year called as its conductor Hans Richter, friend of Wagner and one of the principal conductors at Baireuth. Richter continued in this position until 1911. Then there were more guest conductors; Michael Ballin from 1912 to 1914; and a great variety of leaders during the war. In 1920 Hamilton Harty was placed in command.

Sir Herbert Hamilton Harty (the "sir" dates from 1925) is the son of an Irish organist. He was born Dec. 4, 1879, at Hillsborough, Ireland. His father gave him instruction on the piano, the organ, the viola and in counterpoint. He must have been a precocious youngster, for the lexicons state that he was able to substitute for his father as organist at the age of eight. Aud at twelve he accepted a position as organist in a church at Magheracoll, County Antrim. Similar positions soon followed at Belfast and at Dublin. At the latter place Harty received help and advice from the distinguished Italian pianist, teacher and composer, Michele Esposito. But no formal lessons. For the pianist assured the lad that he would never amount to anything as a pianist because his thumbs were too short. Nevertheless Harty showed Esposito all his attempts at composition, profited by the comments and the experience of his older frinel. Other than the early lessons from his father and the informal friendly advice of Esposito, Sir Hamilton is entirely self taught. To him scores have been more important than textbooks, analysis more instructive than lessons. Did not Beethoven also say that he learned more from his study of Haydn's scores than he ever learned at Haydn's lessons?

In 1900 Mr. Harty, as he then was, took up his residence in London. At that metropolis he soon built for himself an enviable reputation as an accompanist. According to all reports he was the most sensitive and imaginative as well as the most secure and solid of accompanists. By and by, opportunities presented themselves to conduct concerts of the London Symphony Orchestra. In this work his fame gradually grew to great proportions. So that when the Hallé orchestra of Manchester was looking for a conductor, Harty had grown to such a stature that an invitation was extended to him. An untaught Irish lad to step into the shoes of the great German Hallé and the greater German Richter! That he has filled those shoes a decade of brilliant concerts bears eloquent witness.

Some time ago an interviewer wrote, "If anyone were to ask me who was the most modest person I had ever met, I should unhesitatingly say, 'Mr. Hamilton Harty.'" Indeed this scribe relates that the interview he attempted was never concluded. For while the writer's attention was for a moment diverted, his victim escaped unnoticed, and the desired information had to be secured from friends.

At the time he was appointed to the Manchester position he said in answer to a question, "Berlioz and Mozart are my private deities." Berlioz he then rated higher than Wagner. He explained that while most composers kept the wheels of composition running by sheer logic, his two favorites were able to think continually of new and original things. He objected to composers who in their music tried to "convince" him. His two favorites more wisely were content (and able) to make music for him. His preferences have borne fruit in his conducting. For he has given England revealing performances of such works as Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and his Damnation of Faust.

Sir Hamilton also presents no mean figure as a composer. In this field it is the Irishman in him who spoke first, though some of the later works have shown a broad modern cosmopolitanism. His songs have been arrangements of Irish folksongs and settings of Irish poems. One of his earliest works was an Irish Symphony—of which, however, an entirely revised version was made in 1924. Notable also are the Comedy Overture of 1907, the tone poem, "With the Wild Geese" of 1910 and a set of Fantasy Scenes for Orchestra. A violin concerto in D minor had its first performance at the hands of Josef Szigeti in Queen's Hall. One of his most outstanding works is a setting of Whitman's "The Mystic Trumpeter" for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, written for the Leeds festival of 1913. An "Ode to a Nightingale" (1907) for soprano and orchestra, much sung by his wife, the oratorio singer, Agnes Nicholls, brought him early fame. He has also written a considerable amount of chamber music, winning prizes with some of it. Latterly there has come from his pen an excellent version for modern orchestra of Handel's Water Music. But since assuming his duties at Manchester he has been conductor rather than composer.

Honors have not been slow in coming his way. In addition to being knighted in 1925 he was made an honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Music in 1924, received the degree Mus. Doc. from Dublin in 1925 and the same from Manchester in 1926.

A. H. M.

News of Music

Trans. June 12

Newcomers: Harty

A CHANCE paragraph of an article about English conductors in the Strand Magazine for June may reintroduce Sir Hamilton Harty, now on his way from London to Boston to conduct at the "Sunday Pop" of June 21:

Like Sir Landon Ronald, Sir Hamilton Harty is an ideal orchestral accompanist. Both men first came to the fore as accompanists at the piano; for both are fine pianists. But while Sir Landon in his musical tastes leans towards Chaikovsky and Elgar, Sir Hamilton devotes much of his attention to Berlioz, of whose music he is passionately fond. He is an emotional conductor, which makes him an interesting one; but he rarely allows his Irish temperament to get the better of him. His beat is energetic and charged with a large degree of pent-up passion.

Transcript June 15

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pop Concerts, the Cecilia Society and the Esplanade Concerts, player on the viola and the celesta in the Symphony Orchestra, was "cited" in these terms at Tufts College today for the degree of Master of Arts:

"Of all the arts music makes most nearly a universal appeal. Without music life would be bare indeed. Through music the most complex as well as the simplest emotion finds expression. Recognizing these truths, the college does honor to one who, in unusual measure, has enriched the musical life of this community. Arthur Fiedler, versatile musician, accomplished conductor, Master of Arts."

Here in Boston

Sir Hamilton Harty is at sea aboard the President Roosevelt, due at New York late Thursday or early Friday next. By Friday afternoon at latest he is expected in Boston for the concert at which he will conduct in Symphony Hall next Sunday. . . . Adolf Busch, the German violinist of the new generation, is engaged for a pair of Symphony Concerts next season. He is a classicist rather than a "romantic" or a modernist.

Reviewing in the Herald-Tribune the recently published history of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Peter Bowdoin takes it to task because he detected an error in the manifold and minute tables of pieces played and of "assisting artists." He then proceeds to name Mr M. A. De Wolfe Howe, the author, as "Mr. Howell"; to attribute to him a passage manifestly written by Mr. J. N. Burk of Symphony Hall, and to salute Dr. Koussevitzky, in the choice vernacular of the tabloids, as a "batonist."

The receipts from a concert in Paris by Mr. Paderewski have nearly completed the fund for belated memorials to Debussy at Paris and at St. Germain, his birthplace. Two or three years ago at the invitation of Dr. Koussevitzky, Bostonians made their contribution playing on Tuesday, by Mr. [illegible] wicz and Mr. Gundersen, of a C[illegible] by Bach for two violins; the add[illegible] a "Theremin"—the electrical inst[illegible] that draws musical tones from [illegible] —to a performance, on Wed[illegible] of Handel's Largo; a "Dance Pr[illegible] on Thursday; another movement Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphor[illegible] Scherzo with plucked strings—on [illegible] a salute to Sir Hamilton Harty, [illegible] urday, with his arrangement of th[illegible] Conderry Air."

Toscaniniana

Unvexed by the Italian authorit[illegible] Toscanini has crossed the frontie[illegible] Moritz in Switzerland. There [illegible] stay through a fortnight; then go[illegible] reuth where he will begin orches[illegible] hearsals of "Tannhäuser" and "P[illegible] on June 25. This summer the or[illegible] will be drawn from the Philharm[illegible] cieties of Berlin and Vienna an[illegible] the Gewandhaus at Leipzig.

A friend of this department, late[illegible] eling in Italy, sends it a few se[illegible] approving the affronts to Mr. T[illegible] at Bologna, both clipped from [illegible] newspapers. One charges the co[illegible] with "the substitution of a d[illegible] æstheticism for his obligations as[illegible] zen" and rejoices that he encount[illegible] Bologra a stronger and more p[illegible] faith than his—"the religion of the[illegible] The other derides Mr. Toscanini [illegible] who would play the part of a "w[illegible] god" and—most strangely—accus[illegible] of neglect of living Italian com[illegible] As though he had not strewn them[illegible] ocrity after mediocrity, over his c[illegible] in New York!

Post June 15

ETHER WAVE AT POP CONCERT

Audience Hears Theremin and Likes It

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Scientific necromancy played its part in the Pop concert of last evening when midway in the programme Mischa Tulin appeared as soloist on the Theremin, the ether-wave instrument introduced to Boston a few years ago by its inventor, Leon Theremin, as the Thereminovox. As was noted on that occasion, two pieces of apparatus, the one a loud speaker set high on a wooden shaft, the other a small cabinet with a projecting metal rod, make up the instrument. And the performer, standing before the latter, coaxes musical sounds out of the air, his right hand finding the pitch, his left hand controlling the dynamics. The resulting tone suggests a little that of a stringed instrument heard over the radio, in other words that of a wind instrument played with a characteristic string vibrato.

The programme last evening announced but one piece from Mr. Tulin, Handel's Largo, in which the orchestra accompanied him. In response to hearty applause, however, he played with piano accompaniment Carl Bohm's "Still wie die Nacht," and when that was done even more fervid plaudits at length brought him to the stage to play with the same support Saint Saens' "The Swan."

An audience such as that of last evening, which incidentally filled Symphony Hall to the last place, no doubt for the most part it making its first acquaintance with the Theremin, would first of all be impressed by the seeming magic of the instrument itself. But although the Theremin has obvious and apparently inescapable limitations, it may be intrinsically effective in slow-moving, sentimental cantilena, and especially where the notes of melody, as in the case of the airs of Handel and of Bohm played last evening, lie close to one another. The freer modulations, the wider skips of the air of Saint-Saens tended here and there to prove embarrassing to Mr. Tulin though he plays the instrument well, quite as well, indeed, as its inventor. In this last piece there were uncertainties of pitch and, like an inexpert singer, the instrument tended to scoop its tones.

All things considered, however, the Theremin is not to be dismissed as a mere toy. Some musical usefulness may yet be found for it. Already Mr. Stokowski has employed it to strengthen his basses in the Philadelphia Orchestra. And the enthusiasm of last evening's audience set the seal of approval on Mr. Fiedler's invitation to Mr. Tulin to introduce the Theremin at a Pop concert.

To Receive Honorary Degrees at Tufts on Monday

(Ye Craftsman)

Left to Right: Stanley C. Wilson, '01, Governor of Vermont; Miss Marion Park, President of Bryn Mawr; Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra

June 11

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO CONDUCT POPS

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished English conductor, is to visit Boston and take over a Pop concert, according to a cable received at Symphony hall from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in England.

The invitation was made at the suggestion of Arthur Fiedler, who has long admired Sir Hamilton Harty, and has introduced his arrangement of "A Londonderry Air" at the Pops. The distinguished English musician is about to make his first trip to America as conductor. He has been engaged to conduct a series of concerts in the Hollywood bowl in July. When he leads the last of the Sunday Pop concerts in Symphony hall on June 21, he will make his only appearance in the eastern United States.

Sir Hamilton Harty has been the famous conductor since 1920 of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, with which he gives an annual series in London. Born in Hillsborough, Ireland, in 1879, he became church organist in County Antrim at the age of 12. He has had a long and distinguished career as accompanist, as composer, and as arranger of Irish folk songs and other music. He won his first high fame as conductor during the seasons in which he led the London Symphony orchestra.

POPS TONIGHT

Arthur Fiedler will lead the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight.

Le Coq d'Or, wedding march ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
London Symphony, minuet ..... Haydn
Largo ..... Handel
Tales from Johann Strauss ..... Korngold
Aida, Fantasia ..... Verdi
Oberon, overture ..... Weber
Streets of Pekin, suite ..... Hadley
(Conducted by the composer)
Mlle. Modiste, selection ..... Herbert
Jalousie, tango ..... Gade
Lohengrin, introduction to Act III. ..Wagner

ARE YOUR PICTURES SUFFERING?

How Long Since They Were Examined by an Expert?

As a rule pictures are neglected and deteriorate, making their restoration expensive.

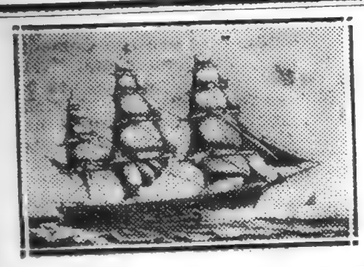
Our shops are unexcelled. We restore for many of the leading public and private galleries from coast to coast.

Our frames, designed by H. Dudley Murphy, are the standard for beauty, simplicity and quality. Get the originals, not inferior copies.

Appraising and Re-gilding

Robert C. Vose Galleries
Established 1841
559 Boylston St.
Boston

(F)



CLIPPER SHIPS

Colorful reproductions of Flying Cloud, Game Cock and Westward Ho, from originals by A. C. Edwards, will add charm to your summer home.

Framed in black and gilt, outside measure 27¼x21 inches. Price $22.50 each. Gilt framed, with black glass mat, $35 each. Unframed, $12 each.

FOSTER BROTHERS
4 PARK SQUARE BOSTON
HANcock 1066

(F)

in Manchester. Soon he was seeking the financial support that would make this orchestra permanent. And from the following year (1858) the new orchestra began to give regular concerts. Thus the origin of the Hallé orchestra. Until 1911 it shared its conductors with the "Gentlemen's Concerts." At that time the latter made an attempt for independence by engaging Sir Henry Wood as their own individual conductor. But with the outbreak of the Great War these concerts were abandoned never to be resumed. Meanwhile the Hallé concerts continued to flourish.

Hallé himself was a pianist and ensemble player as well as conductor of great repute. He instituted a notable series of piano concerts at his own home, playing at one group of such concerts the entire list of Beethoven's sonatas. He was much in demand throughout England as pianist in various combinations of chamber music. And of no course no less as conductor.

After Sir Charles Hallé's death in 1895 the orchestra which he had called into being and which had been his very own for thirty-seven years, suffered a season of guest conductors; played under Frederick Cowen as temporary conductor until 1899; in that year called as its conductor Hans Richter, friend of Wagner and one of the principal conductors at Baireuth. Richter continued in this position until 1911. Then there were more guest conductors; Michael Ballin from 1912 to 1914; and a great variety of leaders during the war. In 1920 Hamilton Harty was placed in command.

Sir Herbert Hamilton Harty (the "sir" dates from 1925) is the son of an Irish organist. He was born Dec. 4, 1879, at Hillsborough, Ireland. His father gave him instruction on the piano, the organ, the viola and in counterpoint. He must have been a precocious youngster, for the lexicons state that he was able to substitute for his father as organist at the age of eight. Aud at twelve he accepted a position as organist in a church at Magheracoll, County Antrim. Similar positions soon followed at Belfast and at Dublin. At the latter place Harty received help and advice from the distinguished Italian pianist, teacher and composer, Michele Esposito. But no formal lessons. For the pianist assured the lad that he would never amount to anything as a pianist because his thumbs were too short. Nevertheless Harty showed Esposito all his attempts at composition, profited by the comments and the experience of his older frinel. Other than the early lessons from his father and the informal friendly advice of Esposito, Sir Hamilton is entirely self taught. To him scores have been more important than textbooks, analysis more instructive than lessons. Did not Beethoven also say that he learned more from his study of Haydn's scores than he ever learned at Haydn's lessons?

In 1900 Mr. Harty, as he then was, took up his residence in London. At that metropolis he soon built for himself an enviable reputation as an accompanist. According to all reports he was the most sensitive and imaginative as well as the most secure and solid of accompanists. By and by, opportunities presented themselves to conduct concerts of the London Symphony Orchestra. In this work his fame gradually grew to great proportions. So that when the Hallé orchestra of Manchester was looking for a conductor, Harty had grown to such a stature that an invitation was extended to him. An untaught Irish lad to step into the shoes of the great German Hallé and the greater German Richter! That he has filled those

Concert-Crier

TRANS. June 13

The Pops

Seventh Week—The event of next week at The Pops falls at the end of it—the coming of Sir Hamilton Harty, the noted conductor of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester and London to be guest-leader at the "Sunday Pop" of June 21. Elsewhere in these pages is an article about him, the Hallé Orchestra and its concerts. Sir Hamilton is now en route to New York. He has not yet sent forward his program. It is expected at any moment. Though he comes out of season, on his way to conduct in California, he deserves an appreciative audience for his one concert in the East.

As it happens, Boston University has taken the whole of Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, for a Commencement rite, and the doors are closed to the general public. Otherwise the exceptions to normal course are the playing on Tuesday, by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen, of the slow movement in Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins: the addition of a "Theremin"—the electrical instrument that draws musical tones from the air—to a performance, on Wednesday, of Handel's Largo; a "Dance Program" on Thursday; another movement from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony— the Scherzo with plucked strings—on Friday; a salute to Sir Hamilton Harty, on Saturday, with his arrangement of the "Londonderry Air." Mr. del Castillo's "Cuckoo Clock" will be heard on Tuesday, and Mr. Nagel's Caprice, "Tilla," on Wednesday.

Herald June 17

SIR HAMILTON HARTY RADIOS POPS PROGRAM

A radiogram just received at Symphony hall from Sir Hamilton Harty discloses the program with which the distinguished British conductor will make his first appearance in this country when he is the guest conductor of the Pop concert in Symphony hall next Sunday evening. The message was received from the SS President Roosevelt on which Sir Hamilton is now crossing the Atlantic. The boat will dock in New York on Friday morning and from there the conductor will proceed immediately to Boston.

Sir Hamilton Harty, long known by repute as conductor of the London Symphony orchestra and the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, is on his way to California where he will conduct a series in the Hollywood bowl.

His program for Boston will be as follows:

Overture to "The Bartered Bride"... Smetana
Variations on a theme by Haydn.... Brahms
"With the Wild Geese" ..... Harty
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" ..... Mozart
"Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans" ..... Berlioz
Theme with variations from suite No. 3 Tchaikovsky

At The Pops

Trans. June 13

Intending visitors to The Pops next Monday may alter their plans. On that evening Boston University has taken the whole of Symphony Hall for a Commencement rite, and the doors are closed to the general public. Otherwise the exceptions to normal course are the playing on Tuesday, by Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen, of a Concerto by Bach for two violins; the addition of a "Theremin"—the electrical instrument that draws musical tones from the air—to a performance, on Wednesday, of Handel's Largo; a "Dance Program" on Thursday; another movement from Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony—the Scherzo with plucked strings—on Friday; a salute to Sir Hamilton Harty, on Saturday, with his arrangement of the Londonderry Air."

Toscaniniana

Unvexed by the Italian authorities, Mr. Toscanini has crossed the frontier to St. Moritz in Switzerland. There he will stay through a fortnight; then go to Baireuth where he will begin orchestral rehearsals of "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal" on June 25. This summer the orchestra will be drawn from the Philharmonic Societies of Berlin and Vienna and from the Gewandhaus at Leipzig.

A friend of this department, lately traveling in Italy, sends it a few sentences, approving the affronts to Mr. Toscanini at Bologna, both clipped from Fascist newspapers. One charges the conductor with "the substitution of a decadent æstheticism for his obligations as a citizen" and rejoices that he encountered at Bologna a stronger and more powerful faith than his—"the religion of the State." The other derides Mr. Toscanini as one who would play the part of a "wrathful god" and—most strangely—accuses him of neglect of living Italian composers. As though he had not strewn them, mediocrity after mediocrity, over his concerts in New York!

News of Music

Trans. June 12

Newcomers: Harty

A CHANCE paragraph of an article about English conductors in the Strand Magazine for June may re-introduce Sir Hamilton Harty, now on his way from London to Boston to conduct at the "Sunday Pop" of June 21:

Like Sir Landon Ronald, Sir Hamilton Harty is an ideal orchestral accompanist. Both men first came to the fore as accompanists at the piano; for both are fine pianists. But while Sir Landon in his musical tastes leans towards Chaikovsky and Elgar, Sir Hamilton devotes much of his attention to Berlioz, of whose music he is passionately fond. He is an emotional conductor, which makes him an interesting one; but he rarely allows his Irish temperament to get the better of him. His beat is energetic and charged with a large degree of pent-up passion.

Transcript June 15

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pop Concerts, the Cecilia Society and the Esplanade Concerts, player on the viola and the celesta in the Symphony Orchestra, was "cited" in these terms at Tufts College today for the degree of Master of Arts:

"Of all the arts music makes most nearly a universal appeal. Without music life would be bare indeed. Through music the most complex as well as the simplest emotion finds expression. Recognizing these truths, the college does honor to one who, in unusual measure, has enriched the musical life of this community, Arthur Fiedler, versatile musician, accomplished conductor, Master of Arts."

Here in Boston

Sir Hamilton Harty is at sea aboard the President Roosevelt, due at New York late Thursday or early Friday next. By Friday afternoon at latest he is expected in Boston for the concert at which he will conduct in Symphony Hall next Sunday. . . . Adolf Busch, the German violinist of the new generation, is engaged for a pair of Symphony Concerts next season. He is a classicist rather than a "romantic" or a modernist.

Reviewing in the Herald-Tribune the recently published history of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Peter Bowdoin takes it to task because he detected an error in the manifold and minute tables of pieces played and of "assisting artists." He then proceeds to name Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, the author, as "Mr. Howell"; to attribute to him a passage manifestly written by Mr. J. N. Burk of Symphony Hall, and to salute Dr. Koussevitzky, in the choice vernacular of the tabloids, as a "batonist."

The receipts from a concert in Paris by Mr. Paderewski have nearly completed the fund for belated memorials to Debussy at Paris and at St. Germain, his birthplace. Two or three years ago at the invitation of Dr. Koussevitzky, Bostonians made their contribution

Post June 15

ETHER WAVE AT POP CONCERT

Audience Hears Theremin and Likes It

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Scientific necromancy played its part in the Pop concert of last evening when midway in the programme Mischa Tulin appeared as soloist on the Theremin, the ether-wave instrument introduced to Boston a few years ago by its inventor, Leon Theremin, as the Thereminovox. As was noted on that occasion, two pieces of apparatus, the one a loud speaker set high on a wooden shaft, the other a small cabinet with a projecting metal rod, make up the instrument. And the performer, standing before the latter, coaxes musical sounds out of the air, his right hand finding the pitch, his left hand controlling the dynamics. The resulting tone suggests a little that of a stringed instrument heard over the radio, in other words that of a wind instrument played with a characteristic string vibrato.

The programme last evening announced but one piece from Mr. Tulin, Handel's Largo, in which the orchestra accompanied him. In response to hearty applause, however, he played with piano accompaniment Carl Bohm's "Still wie die Nacht," and when that was done even more fervid plaudits at length brought him to the stage to play with the same support Saint Saens' "The Swan."

An audience such as that of last evening, which incidentally filled Symphony Hall to the last place, no doubt for the most part it making its first acquaintance with the Theremin, would first of all be impressed by the seeming magic of the instrument itself. But although the Theremin has obvious and apparently inescapable limitations, it may be intrinsically effective in slow-moving, sentimental cantilena, and especially where the notes of melody, as in the case of the airs of Handel and of Bohm played last evening, lie close to one another. The freer modulations, the wider skips of the air of Saint-Saens tended here and there to prove embarrassing to Mr. Tulin though he plays the instrument well, quite as well, indeed, as its inventor. In this last piece there were uncertainties of pitch and, like an inexpert singer, the instrument tended to scoop its tones.

All things considered, however, the Theremin is not to be dismissed as a mere toy. Some musical usefulness may yet be found for it. Already Mr. Stokowski has employed it to strengthen his basses in the Philadelphia Orchestra. And the enthusiasm of last evening's audience set the seal of approval on Mr. Fiedler's invitation to Mr. Tulin to introduce the Theremin at a Pop concert.

...egrees at Tufts on Monday

...ling companions were slain. ...y-five young Juarez, Mexico, ...raded through the border ...placards demanding justice ...ing. The paraders halted ... the American consulate ...rned their placards so atta... ...ad the inscriptions and ...

...it and Weygan... ...n the Immorta...

...June 11 (A.P.)—The Fr... ...mustered thirty-four of its ...rty members for the elec... ...ademicians today. The n... ...Pierre Benoit, was elected ... ballot to succeed the ... Portoriche, dramatist. E... ...re required to elect. ...Weygand, present comma... ...the French army, was ele... ...osition to fill the seat of ...al Joffre. He was a tru... ...Marshal Foch. The acad... ...full strength of forty.

...noit has long been know... ...leading humorous writer ... is the author of "Atlant... ...wrote "Lac Sale," which ...e difficulties of Mormon... ...ty. This work caused n... ...because of its adm...

(Ye Craftsman)

...vernor of Vermont; Miss Marion Park, President of Bryn Mawr; ...onductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra

Trans June 11

June 18

The Theremin Sounds Across Symphony Hall

A New Instrument at The Pops, Harty's Promising Program, "Facade" at Last

At twenty-five minutes to ten o'clock last evening, two members of the staff at Symphony Hall might have been observed—as old novels used to begin—bearing to the front of the stage, a rosewood, or a mahogany, cabinet resembling in height, shape and general dimensions the small desks sometimes provided in hotel-rooms. It differed from them in that, to the spectator's left, a metal rod, say two feet long, rose vertically from the corner; while from the right projected horizontally another metal rod, looped as one bends the lash of a whip to the butt. By chance the doors of the cabinet flew open and disclosed, at a quick glance, a rack of vacuum tubes. Beside the cabinet, on a rod possibly six feet tall, stood a small box connected with it by a wire. The reviewer, whose knowledge of the sound-transmitting apparatus is meager, could not identify it; but a young gentleman from the University who happened to be sitting in the next chair, assured him that the box concealed "the baffle board" of an ordinary dynamic loudspeaker.

These preliminaries completed, a substantial Russian now resident in Boston, Mr. Mischa Tulin, took his place, standing, behind the cabinet. Mr. Fiedler mounted the conductor's stand. The strings, the harp and the organ sounded the first measures of that air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes" which all the English-speaking world knows as his "Largo." Soon Mr. Tulin began the making of delicate passes with his hands and adroit motions with his fingers before the erect and the looped rods. With his right hand and the vertical rod—the young gentleman from the University again explained—Mr. Tulin was controlling the tone or pitch; with his left and the horizontal rod, the volume and intensity. Meanwhile the musical and non-scientific ear discovered a new and pervasive strand in the tonal mass. It had a body and a quality of its own that may be best likened to the voice of a violoncello, sounding its lower notes, but deepened, intensified, perhaps slightly coarsened. This new tone was subjected steadily to a vibrato or tremolo like the magnified quaver of an over-emotionalizing singer. The Theremin—as the new instrument is named from the Russian physicist who invented it—continued under Mr. Tulin's graceful persuasions, to draw musical sounds from the ether waves and to bear its part, with a brief interval, in the performance of the Largo.

At the end a hushed house rang with applause. After sundry recalls Mr. Tulin again took his stand before the Theremin, with a pianist in the background to join him in the performance of Boehm's familiar German song, "Still as the Night." The piano no more than filled the interstices of accompaniment; while the Theremin, under Mr. Tulin's moving hands and bending fingers, sang the melody. Now the tone was softer and sweeter, less like that of a magnified violoncello, nearer akin to that of a humming human voice. The vibrato was also less obtrusive and persistent. For such a piece as Boehm's, the sound was not only musical. It also lent charm, grace and a certain beauty.

Again warmly recalled, Mr. Tulin and the pianist played an arrangement of Saint-Saëns "Swan." Here for the first time, the emitted sound was disappointing. The Theremin, as before, sustained tone with a legato that a master-singer might envy; but the quality of tone itself lacked the depth and the richness discoverable in the Largo and, no less, the softness and sweetness noted in Boehm's song. It was thin and wiry: lacked character and enticement; suggested mechanical process. The answering applause died quickly. . . . So was the Theremin, as it is today and as instrument offered to the public like any other, "demonstrated" for the first time in a Bostonian concert-room. The open-minded Fiedler gave the opportunity. A full house heard and was impressed.

Scientifically Speaking

For the amateur whose inclinations are scientific rather than musical, the young gentleman from the University, who dabbles in physics, has drafted two supplementary paragraphs: "When the human hand is brought into the sensitive electrical field surrounding the vertical antenna, the field is so affected that audio-frequency notes, or musical sounds, are produced. These are amplified by vacuum tubes within the cabinet and passed through the loud-speaker. As the hand approaches the vertical antenna, the pitch of the sounds becomes higher; as the hand is withdrawn, the pitch becomes lower.

"When the hand is lowered over the horizontal looped antenna, the volume is lessened, in minute graduations, down to the faintest whisper; when the hand is raised the volume is increased by the same delicate graduations, to an intensity exceeding that of the most powerful stringed instrument.

"The sounds originate from two oscillating circuits within the Theremin, which produce a heterodyne note, varied and controlled by the position of the player's hand in relation to the vertical antenna. Electrically, an ordinary house current suffices. The principle utilized is well known to every early radio broadcast fan. He has mastered the undesirable squeal, so readily obtained from the first home-made radios when the hand of the operator was brought near any part of it, and converted it into musical values."

The Guest and His Music

In anticipation Sir Hamilton Harty's program for his evening at Symphony Hall, next Sunday, as guest-conductor, seems a pleasing compromise between a "Sunday Pop" and a symphony concert in regular course. It begins with Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride"—show-piece at Symphony Hall in Dr. Muck's time; since seldom heard there—a gay and rushing music teeming with bright melody and lively rhythm, by its fleetness virtuoso-test for both conductor and orchestra. . . . Next comes the lighter Brahms of the eight variations and a full-voiced finale upon a theme out of Haydn, songfully diversified and developed. . . . Then Sir Hamiltn himself as composer in a tone-poem, "With the Wild Geese," suggested to his Irish imagination by a bit of Celtic poetry.

After intermission, as though the guest knew by reputation the quality of the Bostonian strings. Mozart's "Little Night-Music," otherwise a Serenade for String Orchestra dropping lightly from the composer's fingers—an Allegro for beginning and for end; between a Romanza and a Minuet. Next the inevitable number from Berlioz—since Sir Hamilton is his high priest among British conductors—the music of the scene, "Royal Hunt and Tempest," from the Vergilian opera of his last years, "The Trojans." Finally, for a second virtuoso-piece—conductors cannot resist them—the finale from Chaikovsky's Suite in G major, long unheard at Symphony Hall.

Vergil to Music

Since the number from Berlioz is a descriptive piece, here follows, in essential parts, the program-note drafted in 1928, when Sir T. Beecham, another guest-conductor, included "Royal Hunt and Tempest" in a pair of Symphony Concerts; "Æneas has returned to Dido at Carthage. Now comes the fatal episode that Juno and Venus have prepared: a hunt, a tempest. . . . At first there is a slow awakening of the forest. Day breaks, and one sees white Naiads sporting between the reeds. Suddenly there is a hunting fanfare. The freightened Naiads stop and listen. The fanfare is heard nearer and nearer. The Naiads vanish in the reeds; hunters quickly cross the stage; they are dispersed. Now there is the undefined rustling of the forest whipped by wind and rain. Innumerable drops fall from leaves on leaves. A new fanfare. A hunter runs, distracted, caught by the storm that is everywhere. A flash of lightning. Æneas and Dido find refuge in the fatal cave.

"Fauns appear, and bounding on their shaggy feet pursue dishevelled nymphs. A thunderbolt falls, shatters an oak and fires it, whereupon sylvan creatures and satyrs brandish the blazing branches as nuptial torches. They dance madly. While the forest resounds with the howling of the nymphs, voices are heard throwing out an omen of death. They cry, these inevitable voices: 'Italy! Italy!' At last the tempest subsides. The Naiads reappear in the reeds. Far away a last fanfare fades into the silence."

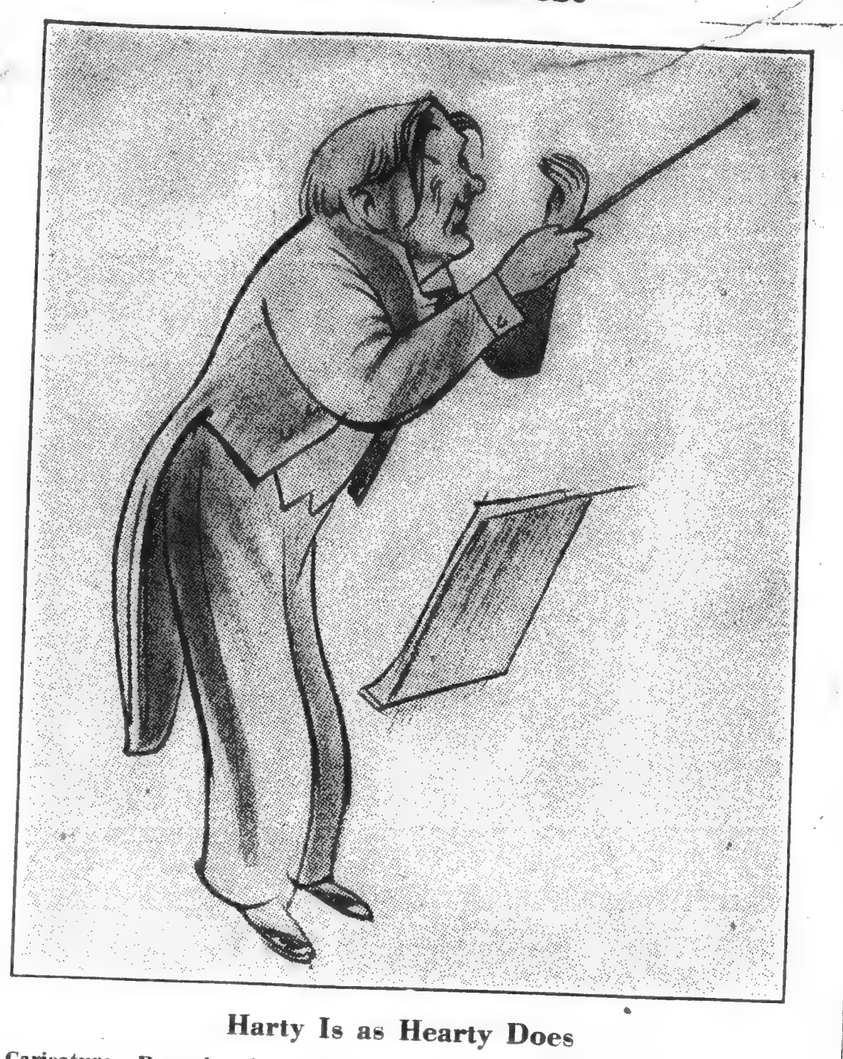
"Façade" for Sport

Though The Pops have only a fortnight to run, Mr. Fiedler still has interesting "novelties" to shake out of his sleeves. . . . The exuberant overture, "Portsmouth Point," introduced William Walton to Bostonian ears as one of the liveliest of young Britons. To this exuberant piece, several times repeated at Symphony Hall, succeeded a "Sinfonia Concertante" that confirmed Mr. Walton as a composer who wrote in high spirits with fresh invention. Still earlier in his musical day, he had made the music to "Façade," a singular entertainment devised and accomplished by his friends, the Sitwells. In the course of it Osbert read through a megaphone poems of a highly modernist sort written by his sister, Edith. They were interspersed and supplemented by sympathetic "numbers" from Mr. Walton. Out of them Mr. Fiedler takes a Tango; a Pasodobile—a Spanish march rhythm; a Swiss Yodelling Song; a Polka—all of which he and the orchestra will duly play next Wednesday evening, June 24. (There will be no reading of the poems, with or without megaphone.) By way of prelude, these columns will contain Ernest Newman's amusing account of "Façade" as he sat before it in London five summers ago.

On the same evening, Mr. Sanromá will be heard for the first time in the solo-part of Weber's Concert-Piece for Piano and Orchestra, successfully revived, after long neglect, by Mr. Borovsky last spring in Cambridge. Mr. Sanromá should warm to it. Otherwise Mr. Fiedler proposes a Russian program, well stocked with numbers from Chaikovsky, for Monday evening, June 22; includes ten episodes from Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival" in the program for Thursday, June 25; repeats with Mr. Sanromá, Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" on Saturday, June 27.

H. T. P.

Jest and Guest



Harty Is as Hearty Does

Caricature, Reproduced by Courtesy of the Strand Magazine, of the Eminent Conductor at Symphony Hall Next Sunday Evening

HARTY TO LEAD 'POP' CONCERT

English Conductor Returns to Boston After 20-Year Absence

Lawder June 20

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, is back in Boston today after an absence of 20 years, to appear once more before an audience here. But whereas his first appearance was in the role of pianist, Sir Hamilton comes this time to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "Pop" concert at Symphony hall tomorrow evening.

The composer-conductor, who is Irish by birth, is pausing only briefly in Boston on the start of a three-month tour in America. He plans to go immediately from this city to San Francisco to conduct the Symphony orchestra there in one concert. Then to San Mateo, Cal., for a similar appearance, followed by 12 concerts in two weeks in Hollywood, probably in the Rose bowl. Once more he will conduct in San Francisco and then he returns to England for the opening of the season.

Another mission besides the opportunity of appearing as guest conductor of American orchestras, brings Sir Hamilton to this country. The American people, he believes, are not acquainted with the charming compositions of English artists. The same situation in regard to American composers and their works holds true in England. Hence Sir Hamilton hopes to act as an ambassador of music by introducing the contemporary music of the two countries to each other.

CONCERT TO BE HELD TONIGHT

Tonight he will enjoy the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler—and will have the pleasure of hearing one of his own arrangements played. The Boston Orchestra, according to Sir Hamilton, is held by the English as the best in America.

On the matter of radio broadcasting in England, Sir Hamilton waxed eloquent. He explained the difference in the American and English systems, pointing out that a government monopoly exists in England where one orchestra—the London Symphony—is chosen to handle all the air concerts. Sir Hamilton feels very strongly that the appropriation for this broadcasting should include the other leading British orchestras—that of the city of Birmingham, the Scottish symphony, and his own of Manchester which he believes leads all the rest. Greater variety of program would follow such a course of action. Sir Hamilton made it very clear that he was not attacking broadcasting, which he respects, but the way it is administered in England. In this country, he said, it is the fashion to support music; but not so in England where the people are not ready to spend money on orchestras.

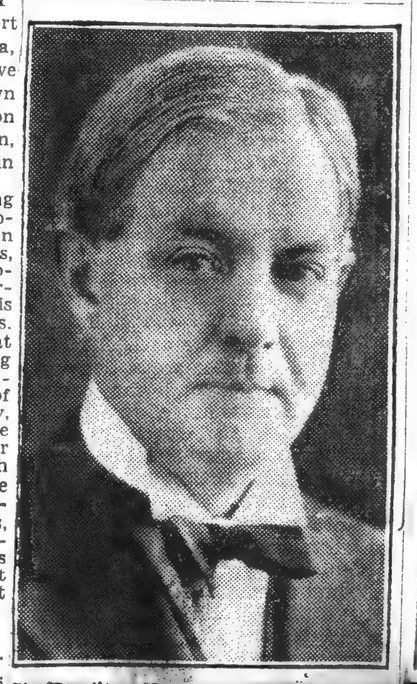
SEES JAZZ ON WANE

As for jazz, the British conductor believes that it is on the wane and has not enough fundamental musical worth to make it endure. He admits, however, that he is partial to George Gershwin and his compositions.

As might have been expected, the mention of Hollywood brought forth the question of Sir Hamilton's attitude on the moving pictures. As in all other questions, his attitude was perfectly definite.

"I am not interested," he said. "Nor shall I be."

Sir Hamilton holds the degree of doctor of music in Trinity College, Dublin, and in Victoria University, Manchester. He is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.



EIGHTH WEEK OF THE POPS

Herald June 21

Sir Hamilton Harty will be the guest conductor in Symphony hall tonight as the pop concerts open the last two weeks of their 46th season, this being the last Sunday concert. Sir Hamilton Harty is to make his first bow to the American public as conductor, although his name has long been known to us by the high repute of his Halle Concerts in Manchester, England, which he has led since 1920. The distinguished musician was previously conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. Some years ago, he visited this country as a pianist. The Halle orchestra, founded in 1857 by Sir Charles Halle and conducted by him for a number of years, continued under the direction of the famous Hans Richter from 1899 to 1911. Sir Hamilton Harty is on his way to California to conduct at the Hollywood Bowl.

Arthur Fiedler will present a Russian programme tomorrow evening, and introduce to Boston on Wednesday "Facade" by William Walton, the English composer, which is based on poems by Edith Sitwell. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist on the same evening, playing a concert piece for piano and orchestra by Weber. Saint-Saens's "Animals' Carnival" will be a feature of the Thursday concert, and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at the Saturday concert.

The programs of the week follow:

TONIGHT

Smetana . . Overture to "The Bartered Bride"
Brahms . . Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Harty . . "With the Wild Geese" (After a poem by Emily Lawless)
Mozart . . "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
Berlioz . . "Royal Hunt and Tempest," Descriptive symphony from "The Trojans" Tchaikovsky . . Theme with Variations from Suite No. 3, Op. 55

MONDAY

Le Coq d'Or, Wedding March . . Rimsky-Korsakov
Scheherazade, The Prince and the Princess . . Rimsky-Korsakov
The Fire Bird, Berceuse . . Stravinsky
Prince Igor, Polovetzkian Dances . . Borodin
Swan Lake, Suite . . Tchaikovsky
Scene—Dance of the Swans—Czardas
Fifth Symphony, Second Movement
Andante cantabile . . Tchaikovsky
Marche Slav . . Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor . . Rachmaninoff
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song . . Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance . . Glazounov

TUESDAY

The Prophet, Coronation March . . Meyerbeer
Merry Wives of Windsor, Overture . . Nicolai
En Sourdine . . Tellam
Rigoletto, Fantasia . . Verdi
La Govita . . Langendoen
Thais, Meditation . . Massenet
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, Third Movement . . Tchaikovsky
Allegro molto vivace
Tales from the Vienna Woods, Waltz . . Strauss
March of the Little Lead Soldiers . . Pierne
American Patrol . . Meacham

WEDNESDAY

Semper Fidelis, March . . Sousa
The Barber of Seville, Overture . . Rossini
Kammenoi Ostrow . . Rubinstein-Herbert
Madame Butterfly, Fantasia . . Puccini
Petite Suite . . Debussy
En Bateau
Cortege
Facade . . Walton
(after poems of Edith Sitwell)
Tango—Pasodobile
Swiss Jodelling Song
Polka
(First performance in Boston)
Concert Piece in F minor for Piano and Orchestra . . Weber
Soloist—Jesus Mario Sanroma
Girl Crazy, selection . . Gershwin
Loin du Bal . . Gillet
Aragonaise, from "The Cid" . . Massenet

THURSDAY

Aida, Triumphal March . . Verdi
Mignon, Overture . . Thomas
Dance of the Gnomes . . Carroll
La Source, Ballet Suite . . Delibes
Scarf Dance Love Scene Variation
Circassian Dance
Espana, Rhapsody . . Chabrier
The Animals' Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia . . Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lion, Cocks and Hens.
Tortoises
The Elephant (Solo double-bass—M. Kunze)
Kangaroos
Personages with long ears
The Cuckoo in the depth of the forest
Pianists
The Swan (Solo violoncello, J. Langendoen)
Finale
(Pianists—Messrs. Sanroma and Litwin)
Ride of the Valkyries . . Wagner
Waves of the Danube, Waltz . . Ivanovici
Traumerei . . Schumann
Carmen, Prelude . . Bizet

FRIDAY

March, "Second Connecticut" . . Reeves
Raymond Overture . . Thomas
Spring . . Grieg
Il Trovatore, Fantasia . . Verdi
Prelude in C-sharp minor . . Rachmaninoff
Rienzi, Overture . . Wagner
Boston Credit Men's Glee Club
Victor Herbert Favorites. Arranged by . . Sanford
Sheep and Goat (Walkin' to the Pasture) . . Guion (Cowboys' and Old Fiddlers' Breakdown)
Washington Post, March . . Sousa

SATURDAY

Marche Militaire . . Schubert
Liebestraum . . Liszt-Herbert
Die Meistersinger, Prelude . . Wagner
Largo . . Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Rhapsody in Blue . . Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
Samson and Delilah, Bacchanale . . Saint-Saens
Molly on the Shore . . Grainger
Vienna Blood, Waltz . . Strauss
Entrance of the Gladiators . . Fucik

JUNE 22 1931

HARTY WINS AUDIENCE AT THE POPS

Pat

Famous English Conductor Plays Own Tone Poem

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a fortunate thought whether it originated with Arthur Fiedler or with the management of the Symphony Orchestra, to invite Sir Hamilton Harty, the Irish-born conductor of the Halle concerts in Manchester, Eng., to stop off at Boston on his way from New York to California, where he is to be one of the conductors at the concerts in the Hollywood Bowl, to take charge of the Pop concert of last evening. Not within the longest memory have the Pops offered a distinguished guest conductor or been the means of making Boston acquainted with so notable a musician as Sir Hamilton Harty.

STEPS INTO FAVOR

Warm applause greeted Sir Hamilton when he made his first appearance on the stage last evening. A genial figure of a man in middle life, whose buoyant step and jaunty manner belied the grayness of his hair, Sir Hamilton instantly won and consistently kept the favor of the audience, as by report he won the affections of the orchestra. Indeed something more than his very considerable technical ability must have been needed for him to have made the orchestra so completely his own in the exceedingly brief time granted him for rehearsal.

Although the pieces on last evening's programme had been little more than read through, there was neither slip nor hitch in the performance, while often there was both eloquence and distinction in the playing.

For most in the audience, to judge by the demonstration which followed it, the climax of last evening's concert was the first performance in Boston of Sir Hamilton Harty's own tone-poem "With the Wild Geese," based on the poems of Miss Emily Lawless, which celebrate the Irish patriots who, after the battle of Aughrim, took service in the armies of France and Spain and who perished in large numbers fighting bravely in the [illegible] It is with the battle

Music Month

Modernists at Play

For fillip to the Pop concert of last evening in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler introduced to Boston a suite drawn from the "Façade" of William T. Walton, composed to poems by Edith Sitwell. At the first performance of this music, five years ago in London, the poems were recited through a megaphone protruding from a curtain behind which played an orchestra consisting of flute and piccolo, clarinet and bass clarinet, saxophone, trumpet, violoncello and percussion. Last night there was no curtain, no megaphone and no reciter, and the four excerpts from the score had been scored for what appeared to be the conventional orchestra.

No doubt we should have appreciated the flavor of the music more close with its original accessories; but with should not repine, for the "Tan July 4. "Pasodoble," "Swiss Yodeling S S. and "Polka" were sufficiently amusing as we heard them. They show the modernists at play. They are full of sly humor, pointed wit, rhythmic jests, clever parody. They employ the sharp line, the brief phrase, the crossed rhythms, the atonal acidity, even a touch of jazz, to entertaining ends. They are not to be taken too solemnly, as the audience of last night quickly realized. The listeners applauded, indeed, until Mr. Fiedler repeated the "Polka."

JUNE 25, 1931

Another seminovelty was the Weber "Concert Piece" in F minor for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanromá as soloist. Mr. Sanromá gave a brilliant performance of this rather uneven but virtuosic work, and was applauded loud and long by the audience.

Mr. Fiedler deserves the thanks of the public for his energy in introducing such new items as these into the Pops repertory. The next outstanding event of the season is the repetition next Monday evening of the "[illegible] quest" program. The Pops will [illegible] an exceptionally successful year the concert on the evening of J

L. A

The Theremin Sounds Across Symphony Hall

A New Instrument at The Pops, Harty's Promising Program, "Facade" at Last

At twenty-five minutes to ten o'clock last evening, two members of the staff at Symphony Hall might have been observed—as old novels used to begin—bearing to the front of the stage, a rosewood, or a mahogany, cabinet resembling in height, shape and general dimensions the small desks sometimes provided in hotel-rooms. It differed from them in that, to the spectator's left, a metal rod, say two feet long, rose vertically from the corner; while from the right projected horizontally another metal rod, looped as one bends the lash of a whip to the butt. By chance the doors of the cabinet flew open and disclosed, at a quick glance, a rack of vacuum tubes. Beside the cabinet, on a rod possibly six feet tall, stood a small box connected with it by a wire. The reviewer, whose knowledge of the sound-transmitting apparatus is meager, could not identify it: but a young gentleman from the University who happened to be sitting in the next chair, assured him that the box concealed "the baffle board" of an ordinary dynamic loudspeaker.

These preliminaries completed, a substantial Russian now resident in Boston, Mr. Mischa Tulin, took his place, standing, behind the cabinet. Mr. Fiedler mounted the conductor's stand. The strings, the harp and the organ sounded the first measures of that air from Handel's opera, "Xerxes" which all the English-speaking world knows as his "Largo." Soon Mr. Tulin began the making of delicate passes with his hands and adroit motions with his fingers before the erect and the looped rods. With his right hand and the vertical rod—the young gentleman from the University again explained—Mr. Tulin was controlling the tone or pitch; with his left and the horizontal rod, the volume and intensity. Meanwhile the musical and non-scientific ear discovered a new and pervasive strand in the tonal mass. It had a body and a quality of its own that may be best likened to the voice of a violoncello, sounding its lower notes, but deepened, intensified, perhaps slightly coarsened. This new tone was subjected steadily to a vibrato or tremolo like the magnified quaver of an over-emotionalizing singer. The Theremin—as the new instrument is named from the Russian physicist who invented it—continued under Mr. Tulin's graceful persuasions, to draw musical sounds from the ether waves and to bear its part, with a brief interval, in the performance of the Largo.

At the end a hushed house rang with applause. After sundry recalls Mr. Tulin again took his stand before the Theremin, with a pianist in the background to join him in the performance of Boehm's familiar German song, "Still as the Night." The piano no more than filled the interstices of accompaniment; while the Theremin, under Mr. Tulin's moving hands and bending fingers, sang the melody. Now the tone was softer and sweeter, less like that of a magnified violoncello, nearer akin to that of a humming human voice. The vibrato was also less obtrusive and persistent. For such a piece as Boehm's, the sound was not only musical. It also lent charm, grace and a certain beauty.

Again warmly recalled, Mr. Tulin and the pianist played an arrangement of Saint-Saëns "Swan." Here for the first time, the emitted sound was disappointing. The Theremin, as before, sustained tone with a legato that a master-singer might envy; but the quality of tone itself lacked the depth and the richness discoverable in the Largo and, no less, the softness and sweetness noted in Boehm's song. It was thin and wiry: lacked character and enticement; suggested mechanical process. The answering applause died quickly. . . . So was the Theremin, as it is today and as instrument offered to the public like any other, "demonstrated" for the first time in a Bostonian concert-room. The open-minded Fiedler gave the opportunity. A full house heard and was impressed.

Scientifically Speaking

For the amateur whose inclinations are scientific rather than musical, the young gentleman from the University, who dabbles in physics, has drafted two supplementary paragraphs: "When the human hand is brought into the sensitive electrical field surrounding the vertical antenna, the field is so affected that audio-frequency notes, or musical sounds, are produced. These are amplified by vacuum tubes within the cabinet and passed through the loud-speaker. As the hand approaches the vertical antenna, the pitch of the sounds becomes higher; as the hand is withdrawn, the pitch becomes lower.

"When the hand is lowered over the horizontal looped antenna, the volume is lessened, in minute graduations, down to the faintest whisper; when the hand is raised the volume is increased by the same delicate graduations, to an intensity exceeding that of the most powerful stringed instrument.

"The sounds originate from two oscillating circuits within the Theremin, which produce a heterodyne note, varied and controlled by the position of the player's hand in relation to the vertical antenna. Electrically, an ordinary house current suffices. The principle utilized is well known to every early radio broadcast fan. He has mastered the undesirable squeal, so readily obtained from the first home-made radios when the hand of the operator was brought near any part of it, and converted it into musical values."

The Guest and His Music

In anticipation Sir Hamilton Harty's program for his evening at Symphony Hall, next Sunday, as guest-conductor, seems a pleasing compromise between a "Sunday Pop" and a symphony concert in regular course. It begins with Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride"—show-piece at Symphony Hall in Dr. Muck's time; since seldom heard there—a gay and rushing music teeming with bright melody and lively rhythm, by its fleetness virtuoso-test for both conductor and orchestra. . . . Next comes the lighter Brahms of the eight variations and a full-voiced finale upon a theme out of Haydn, songfully diversified and developed. . . . Then Sir Hamiltn himself as composer in a tone-poem, "With the Wild Geese," suggested to his Irish imagination by a bit of Celtic poetry.

After intermission, as though the guest knew by reputation the quality of the Bostonian strings. Mozart's "Little Night-Music," otherwise a Serenade for String Orchestra dropping lightly from the composer's fingers—an Allegro for beginning and for end; between a Romanza and a Minuet. Next the inevitable number from Berlioz—since Sir Hamilton is his high priest among British conductors—the music of the scene, "Royal Hunt and Tempest," from the Vergilian opera of his last years, "The Trojans." Finally, for a second virtuoso-piece—conductors cannot resist them—the finale from Chaikovsky's Suite in G major, long unheard at Symphony Hall.

Vergil to Music

Since the number from Berlioz is a descriptive piece, here follows, in essential parts, the program-note drafted in 1928, when Sir T. Beecham, another guest-conductor, included "Royal Hunt and Tempest" in a pair of Symphony Concerts: "Æneas has returned to Dido at Carthage. Now comes the fatal episode that Juno and Venus have prepared: a hunt, a tempest. . . . At first there is a slow awakening of the forest. Day breaks, and one sees white Naiads sporting between the reeds. Suddenly there is a hunting fanfare. The freightened Naiads stop and listen. The fanfare is heard nearer and nearer. The Naiads vanish in the reeds: hunters quickly cross the stage: they are dispersed. Now there is the undefined rustling of the forest whipped by wind and rain. Innumerable drops fall from leaves on leaves. A new fanfare. A hunter runs, distracted, caught by the storm that is everywhere. A flash of lightning. Æneas and Dido find refuge in the fatal cave.

"Fauns appear, and bounding on their shaggy feet pursue dishevelled nymphs. A thunderbolt falls, shatters an oak and fires it, whereupon sylvan creatures and satyrs brandish the blazing branches as nuptial torches. They dance madly. While the forest resounds with the howling of the nymphs, voices are heard throwing out an omen of death. They cry, these inevitable voices: 'Italy! Italy!' At last the tempest subsides. The Naiads reappear in the reeds. Far away a last fanfare fades into the silence."

"Façade" for Sport

Though The Pops have only a fortnight to run, Mr. Fiedler still has interesting "novelties" to shake out of his sleeves. . . . The exuberant overture, "Portsmouth Point," introduced William Walton to Bostonian ears as one of the liveliest of young Britons. To this exuberant piece, several times repeated at Symphony Hall, succeeded a "Sinfonia Concertante" that confirmed Mr. Walton as a composer who wrote in high spirits with fresh invention. Still earlier in his musical day, he had made the music to "Façade," a singular entertainment devised and accomplished by his friends, the Sitwells. In the course of it Osbert read through a megaphone poems of a highly modernist sort written by his sister, Edith. They were interspersed and supplemented by sympathetic "numbers" from Mr. Walton. Out of them Mr. Fiedler takes a Tango; a Pasodobile—a Spanish march rhythm: a Swiss Yodelling Song: a Polka—all of which he and the orchestra will duly play next Wednesday evening, June 24. (There will be no reading of the poems, with or without megaphone.) By way of prelude, these columns will contain Ernest Newman's amusing account of "Façade" as he sat before it in London five summers ago.

On the same evening, Mr. Sanromá will be heard for the first time in the solo-part of Weber's Concert-Piece for Piano and Orchestra, successfully revived, after long neglect, by Mr. Borovsky last spring in Cambridge. Mr. Sanromá should warm to it. Otherwise Mr .Fiedler proposes a Russian program, well stocked with numbers from Chaikovsky, for Monday evening, June 22; includes ten episodes from Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival" in the program for Thursday, June 25; repeats with Mr. Sanromá, Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" on Saturday, June 27.

H. T. P.

Jest and Guest

Harty Is as Hearty Does

Caricature, Reproduced by Courtesy of the Strand Magazine, of the Eminent Conductor at Symphony Hall Next Sunday Evening

HARTY TO LEAD 'POP' CONCERT

English Conductor Returns to Boston After 20-Year Absence

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, is back in Boston today after an absence of 20 years, to appear once more before an audience here. But whereas his first appearance was in the role of pianist, Sir Hamilton comes this time to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "Pop" concert at Symphony hall tomorrow evening.

The composer-conductor, who is Irish by birth, is pausing only briefly in Boston on the start of a three-month tour in America. He plans to go immediately from this city to San Francisco to conduct the Symphony orchestra there in one concert. Then to San Mateo, Cal., for a similar appearance, followed by 12 concerts in two weeks in Hollywood, probably in the Rose bowl Once more he will conduct in San Francisco and then he returns to England for the opening of the season.

Another mission besides the opportunity of appearing as guest conductor of American orchestras, brings Sir Hamilton to this country. The American people, he believes, are not acquainted with the charming compositions of English artists. The same situation in regard to American composers and their works holds true in England. Hence Sir Hamilton hopes to act as an ambassador of music by introducing the contemporary music of the two countries to each other.

CONCERT TO BE HELD TONIGHT

Tonight he will enjoy the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler—and will have the pleasure of hearing one of his own arrangements played. The Boston Orchestra, according to Sir Hamilton, is held by the English as the best in America.

On the matter of radio broadcasting in England, Sir Hamilton waxed eloquent. He explained the difference in the American and English systems, pointing out that a government monopoly exists in England where one orchestra—the London Symphony—is chosen to handle all the air concerts. Sir Hamilton feels very strongly that the appropriation for this broadcasting should include the other leading British orchestras—that of the city of Birmingham, the Scottish symphony, and his own of Manchester which he believes leads all the rest. Greater variety of program would follow such a course of action. Sir Hamilton made it very clear that he was not attacking broadcasting, which he respects, but the way it is administered in England. In this country, he said, it is the fashion to support music; but not so in England where the people are not ready to spend money on orchestras.

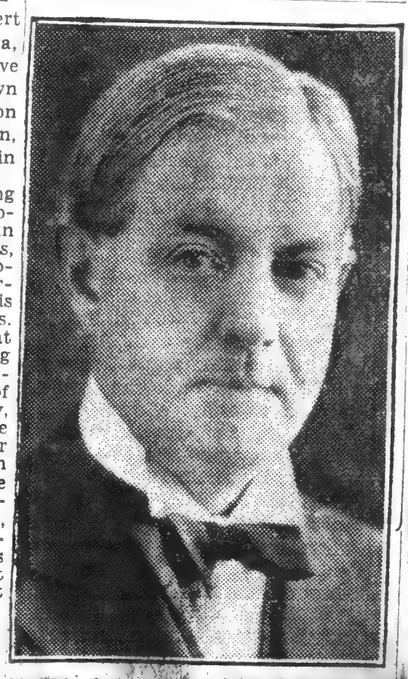
SEES JAZZ ON WANE

As for jazz, the British conductor believes that it is on the wane and has not enough fundamental musical worth to make it endure. He admits, however, that he is partial to George Gershwin and his compositions.

As might have been expected, the mention of Hollywood brought forth the question of Sir Hamilton's attitude on the moving pictures. As in all other questions, his attitude was perfectly definite.

"I am not interested," he said. "Nor shall I be."

Sir Hamilton holds the degree of doctor of music in Trinity College, Dublin, and in Victoria University, Manchester. He is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.



EIGHTH WEEK OF THE POPS

Sir Hamilton Harty will be the guest conductor in Symphony hall tonight as the pop concerts open the last two weeks of their 46th season, this being the last Sunday concert. Sir Hamilton Harty is to make his first bow to the American public as conductor, although his name has long been known to us by the high repute of his Halle Concerts in Manchester, England, which he has led since 1920. The distinguished musician was previously conductor of the London Symphony orchestra. Some years ago, he visited this country as a pianist. The Halle orchestra, founded in 1857 by Sir Charles Halle and conducted by him for a number of years, continued under the direction of the famous Hans Richter from 1899 to 1911. Sir Hamilton Harty is on his way to California to conduct at the Hollywood Bowl.

Arthur Fiedler will present a Russian programme tomorrow evening, and introduce to Boston on Wednesday "Facade" by William Walton, the English composer, which is based on poems by Edith Sitwell. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist on the same evening, playing a concert piece for piano and orchestra by Weber. Saint-Saens's "Animals' Carnival" will be a feature of the Thursday concert, and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" at the Saturday concert.

The programs of the week follow:

TONIGHT

Smetana . . . Overture to "The Bartered Bride"
Brahms . . . Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Harty . . . "With the Wild Geese" (After a poem by Emily Lawless)
Mozart . . . "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
Berlioz . . . "Royal Hunt and Tempest," Descriptive symphony from "The Trojans" Tchaikovsky . . . Theme with Variations from Suite No. 3, Op. 55

MONDAY

Le Coq d'Or, Wedding March . . . Rimsky-Korsakov
Scheherazade, The Prince and the Princess . . . Rimsky-Korsakov
The Fire Bird, Berceuse . . . Stravinsky
Prince Igor, Polovetzkian Dances . . . Borodin
Swan Lake, Suite . . . Tchaikovsky
Scene—Dance of the Swans—Czardas
Fifth Symphony, Second Movement
Andante cantabile . . . Tchaikovsky
Marche Slav . . . Tchaikovsky
Prelude in G minor . . . Rachmaninoff
Dubinushka, Russian Folk Song . . . Arranged by Jacchia
Panaderos, Spanish Dance . . . Glazounov

TUESDAY

The Prophet, Coronation March . . . Meyerbeer
Merry Wives of Windsor, Overture . . . Nicolai
En Sourdine . . . Tellam
Rigoletto, Fantasia . . . Verdi
La Govita . . . Langendoen
Thais, Meditation . . . Massenet
"Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, Third Movement
Allegro molto vivace . . . Tchaikovsky
Tales from the Vienna Woods, Waltz . . . Strauss
March of the Little Lead Soldiers . . . Pierne
American Patrol . . . Meacham

WEDNESSDAY

Semper Fidelis, March . . . Sousa
The Barber of Seville, Overture . . . Rossini
Kammenoi Ostrow . . . Rubinstein-Herbert
Madame Butterfly, Fantasia . . . Puccini
Petite Suite . . . Debussy
En Bateau
Cortege
Facade . . . Walton
(After poems of Edith Sitwell)
Tango—Pasodobile
Swiss Jodelling Song
Polka
(First performance in Boston)
Concert Piece in F minor for Piano and Orchestra . . . Weber
Soloist—Jesus Mario Sanroma
Girl Crazy, selection . . . Gershwin
Lour du Bal . . . Gershwin
Aragonaise, from "The Cid" . . . Gillet
. . . Massenet

THURSDAY

Aida, Triumphal March . . . Verdi
Mignon, Overture . . . Thomas
Dance of the Gnomes . . . Carroll
La Source, Ballet Suite . . . Delibes
Scarf Dance Love Scene Variation
Circassian Dance
Espana, Rhapsody . . . Chabrier
The Animals' Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia . . . Saint-Saens
Introduction and Royal March of the Lion, Cocks and Hens.
Tortoises
The Elephant (Solo double-bass—M. Kunze)
Kangaroos
Personages with long ears
The Cuckoo in the depth of the forest
Pianists
The Swan (Solo violoncello, J. Laugendoen)
Finale
(Pianists—Messrs. Sanroma and Litwin)
Ride of the Valkyries . . . Wagner
Waves of the Danube, Waltz . . . Ivanovici
Traumerei . . . Schumann
Carmen, Prelude . . . Bizet

FRIDAY

March, "Second Connecticut" . . . Reeves
Raymond Overture . . . Thomas
Spring . . . Grieg
Il Trovatore, Fantasia . . . Verdi
Prelude in C-sharp minor . . . Rachmaninoff
Rienzi, Overture . . . Wagner
Boston Credit Men's Glee Club
Victor Herbert Favorites, Arranged by Sanford
Sheep and Goat (Walkin' to the Pasture)
(Cowboys' and Old Fiddlers' Breakdown) Guion
Washington Post, March . . . Sousa

SATURDAY

Marche Militaire . . . Schubert
Liebestraum . . . Liszt-Herbert
Die Meistersinger, Prelude . . . Wagner
Largo . . . Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Rhapsody in Blue . . . Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
Sampson and Delilah, Bacchanale Saint-Saens
Molly on the Shore . . . Grainger
Vienna Blood, Waltz . . . Strauss
Entrance of the Gladiators . . . Fucik

HARTY WINS AUDIENCE AT THE POPS

Famous English Conductor Plays Own Tone Poem

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a fortunate thought, whether it originated with Arthur Fiedler or with the management of the Symphony Orchestra, to invite Sir Hamilton Harty, the Irish-born conductor of the Halle concerts in Manchester, Eng., to stop off at Boston on his way from New York to California, where he is to be one of the conductors at the concerts in the Hollywood Bowl, to take charge of the Pop concert of last evening. Not within the longest memory have the Pops offered a distinguished guest conductor or been the means of making Boston acquainted with so notable a musician as Sir Hamilton Harty.

STEPS INTO FAVOR

Warm applause greeted Sir Hamilton when he made his first appearance on the stage last evening. A genial figure of a man in middle life, whose buoyant step and jaunty manner belied the grayness of his hair, Sir Hamilton instantly won and consistently kept the favor of the audience, as by report he won the affections of the orchestra. Indeed something more than his very considerable technical ability must have been needed for him to have made the orchestra so completely his own in the exceedingly brief time granted him for rehearsal.

Although the pieces on last evening's programme had been little more than read through, there was neither slip nor hitch in the performance, while often there was both eloquence and distinction in the playing.

For most in the audience, to judge by the demonstration which followed it, the climax of last evening's concert was the first performance in Boston of Sir Hamilton Harty's own tone-poem "With the Wild Geese," based on the poems of Miss Emily Lawless, which celebrate the Irish patriots who, after the battle of Aughrim, took service in the armies of France and Spain and who perished in large numbers fighting bravely in the battle of Fontenoy. It is with the battle of Fontenoy that the third section of the tone-poem deals and the impressive finale pictures the winging home to Ireland of the spirits of those who fell upon that field. Were the second section of the work, which depicts the dreams and aspirations of the exiles, a little less diffuse the cumulative effect of the work as a whole might be greater, but there was no denying the response of last evening's audience to the conclusion, at once stirring and poetic. Sir Hamilton's music, like his conducting, is straightforward and without affectation.

SPECIAL TO THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
DAYTON, O., June 25—Gordon Lamb, 18, of Oakland, Calif., won the Oakland Boy Wins Flight to Capitol

M. Parks Jr. '32, Pittsburgh, 6 and 5.
J. B. Reston '32, Illinois, defeated Harry Richenberger '32, Stanford, 4 up.
W. J. Redmond '32, Notre Dame, defeated J. R. Royston '31, Michigan, 4 and 2.
T. J. Aycock Jr. '31, Yale, defeated Randall Ahern '32, Detroit C. C., 7 and 5.
J. G. Rainwater Jr. '32, Tulane, defeated Fred Brand Jr. '32, Penn State, 5 and 4.
R. E. Kepler '32, Ohio State, defeated R. B. Martin '31, Illinois, 1 up (21 holes).
S. W. Noyes Jr. '33, Yale, defeated M. P. Klein '31, Chicago, 1 up (21 holes).

ends. They are not to be taken too solemnly, as the audience of last night quickly realized. The listeners applauded, indeed, until Mr. Fiedler repeated the "Polka."

Another seminovelty was the Weber "Concert Piece" in F minor for piano and orchestra, with J. M. Sanromá as soloist. Mr. Sanromá gave a brilliant performance of this rather uneven but virtuosic work, and was applauded loud and long by the audience.

Mr. Fiedler deserves the thanks of the public for his energy in introducing such new items as these into the Pops repertory. The next outstanding event of the season is the repetition next Monday evening of the "T quest" program. The Pops will an exceptionally successful year the concert on the evening of J

L. A

The Guest in A Concert of Excitements

Sir Hamilton Harty Warms Orchestra and Audience At Symphony Hall

Such summer heat as visited this town from Friday afternoon until Sunday afternoon is the enemy of virtue in the concert-hall. On Saturday evening, as listener, Sir Hamilton Harty made first acquaintance with the Pop Concerts—and the smallest audience in a spring of full houses applauded his orchestral transcription of the "Londonderry Air." On Sunday evening, as guest-conductor, he himself led the orchestra through a light symphonic program—and again Symphony Hall was no more than half-full. (The two balconies, especially the ever-faithful upper tier, were liberally occupied.) The weather had indeed "moderated," as we say in New England, but too late to bring back the fugitives from seaside and countryside. The public of The Pops may have shied at Sir Hamilton's severer program—what with two sets of variations! The public of the Symphony Concerts, which should have been more numerous, comes not to town on a Sunday evening in June.

Possibly the guest, like other Northern Europeans, blessed with a climate that permits the public practice of the art of music through twelve months of the year, may have wondered at the relative suspension of concerts and operas in America with the incoming tide of spring. After that Friday and Saturday in New York and Boston, he may now understand. Doubtless from any cosmopolitan standpoint, we Americans make a comic fuss about our summer heats, as though we would have the world wonder at them. Yet as an atmosphere for concerts, they give us reason.

Happily there were offsets. . . . In the first place, at the rehearsal of Saturday morning—and we all know what our studies or our offices then were—the orchestra took an instant and a strong fancy to Sir Hamilton. Discerning with conductors, they knew him immediately for a leader of ability and experience, clear-minded as to what he wished, stout-willed to gain it. Almost as quickly they discovered that, by grace of his Irish blood, his ways with an orchestra were ingratiating and stimulating. Through three hours they worked for him whole-heartedly. The quickness of the Boston Orchestra to catch and accomplish a guest-conductor's wishes is familiar story from Boston to Berlin. Sir Hamilton may also have discovered that it can be as ready with good will.

On Sunday, freed from bodily discomfort and spurred by the occasion, it played above its summer self. More: at the end of the tone-poem and of the first part of the concert, it laid down its instruments; turned as one man toward the conductor-composer bowing his acknowledgments at the side of the stage; clapped him to the echo; beamed upon him; as though that were not enough, repeated the demonstration at the close of the concert. Not a whit behindhand was the audience. It welcomed Sir Hamilton warmly; heaped applause upon him after every number; twice added shouts to clapping; rose en masse to salute him while he made his final bows. More than once he was named for guest-conductor when Dr. Koussevitzky takes his holiday next winter. . . . The powers that be in the Symphony Orchestra did well when in "the off-season" they made opportunity for Sir Hamilton in the East. They acted—to transfer the army phrase—as officers and gentlemen. Nor can he doubt the temper of his audience. At the summer solstice, a stirring concert is possible in Boston.

Sir Hamilton is at ripe middle age, with graying hair—a tall, square-shouldered, firmly built figure. Toward the audience he has no manner, though he permits himself at moments an engaging Irish smile. Toward the orchestra he is equally unmannered. His right hand beats the measure clearly; his left, unobtrusively used, curves the melodic line or accents the rhythm. He turns quickly to spur a group or a choir from whom, for the moment, he expects much. He uses also Dr. Koussevitzky's familiar gesture—as from one who would draw the orchestra to himself, so infuse himself into it; thereby gain an urgent end. Through the first half of the concert, a listener might have said that ear and hand were most sensitive to the warmth and the richness of the woodwinds and the horns. Soon, however, the performance of Mozart's Serenade made plain that they were not less alert to the quality and finesse of string-tone.

The concert was indeed a succession of discoveries of Sir Hamilton in the practice of the art of conducting. He began with Smetana's Overture to the opera, "The Bartered Bride"—show-piece at Symphony Hall in Dr. Muck's time; played once or twice under Mr. Monteux; overlooked by Dr. Koussevitzky. It was good to hear again for the clear brightness of the Czech folk-tunes, the liveliness of the dance-rhythms, the light verve of the whole. Sir Hamilton enlarged and deepened the pleasure by his unaffected singing of the melodies, his spirited hand upon the dance-tunes, his sensibility in the varying of repeated measures or in the modulation of approaching climax.

Next the familiar variations of Brahms on the theme out of Haydn. Seldom at Symphony Hall has the theme been sung more limpidly and simply, with such beauty of tone from the woodwinds and horns. The Variations were admirably differentiated, as admirably charactered. Throughout Sir Hamilton was all for the lyric, clear-rhythmed, warm-colored, rich-textured Brahms. It is hard to remember when the two Variations vivace (VI. and VII.) have been so distinctively marked; when the Variation grazioso has sounded so felicitously; when the Finale has seemed such full-voiced and full-rounded epitome of the whole. In short a performance to remember.

Then Sir Hamilton as both conductor and composer in his tone-poem, "With the Wild Geese." Its origins in the poems of Emily Lawless, its backgrounds in Irish history and legend, have already been set forth in this place. As the music sounds, initial fanfares proclaim the exiled soldiery. A first division sings their stout hearts, keen wills, high spirits and warm temper. A second recalls the memories of country and Irish life that haunt them—memories that are also longing. Both these divisions proceed from Irish folk-song. Sir Hamilton translates it simply and warmly into the orchestral idiom of the first decade of the century; suffuses it with the intrinsic sentiment; keeps that sentiment direct and masculine; shuns pseudo-Irish softness and sweetness, be it Tom Moore's or that of the later Celtic poets. For him, "The Wild Geese" quit themselves in very truth as men.

The third division—of Fontenoy—is suggestion rather than battle-piece. "Heldenleben," with its swirl of dissonances across a stricken field, was no new thing in 1910; but Sir Hamilton could say, even to Strauss, "Get thee behind me, Sathanas." The finale is apotheosis of the returning shades,

". . . Singing from the fight.
Home to Corca Bascinn in the morning light."

But in the third and the fourth division Sir Hamilton is more reliant upon the common stock of music, A. D. 1910, than upon his own invention through Irish folk-tune. Finally, for an evening's wonder, hear a conductor-composer who scores for orchestra simply.

Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"—the little Serenade for strings, long repertory piece at Symphony Hall—began the second part of the concert. Sir Hamilton played it with a diminished and carefully balanced orchestra; was often singular in his pacing and phrasing; was superlatively sensitive to the return of the melody in the slow movement; sharpened the rhythms of the minuet; gained a Muck-like lightness and fleetness in the finale; in sum, achieved a highly individual "reading" that brushed away the over-sophistication and super-refinement nowadays besetting the lighter Mozart in performance; restored to this Serenade the true voice of fluent and fanciful improvisation.

Next to Berlioz—one of Sir Hamilton's loyalties—in the tone-picturing of the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" that conduct Dido and Æneas across the Carthaginian forest to the fated cave; while Naiads gambol in the sunshine or Fauns wave torches across the storm. "The Trojans" whence the piece comes, was work of Berlioz's final years. To some ears it seems a manufactured music born of thought, will and endless pains. But so to judge it is not to reproach Sir Hamilton's feeling for Berlioz's lean, mean-

HARTY TO LEAD 'POP' CONCERT

English Conductor Returns To Boston After 20-Year Absence

WILL ALSO DIRECT COAST ORCHESTRAS

Herald June 22

Sir Hamilton Harty, conductor of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, England, yesterday returned to Boston after an absence of 20 years, to appear once more before an audience here. But whereas his first appearance was in the role of pianist, Sir Hamilton comes this time to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "Pop" concert at Symphony hall tomorrow evening.

The composer-conductor, who is Irish by birth, is pausing only briefly in Boston on the start of a three-month tour in America. He plans to go immediately from this city to San Francisco to conduct the Symphony orchestra there in one concert. Then to San Mateo, Cal., for a similar appearance, followed by 12 concerts in two weeks in Hollywood, probably in the Rose bowl. Once more he will conduct in San Francisco and then he returns to England for the opening of the season.

Another mission besides the opportunity of appearing as guest conductor of American orchestras, brings Sir Hamilton to this country. The American people, he believes, are not acquainted with the charming compositions of English artists. The same situation in regard to American composers and their works holds true in England. Hence Sir Hamilton hopes to act as an ambassador of music by introducing the contemporary music of the two countries to each other.

CONCERT TO BE HELD TONIGHT

Tonight he will enjoy the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler—and will have the pleasure of hearing one of his own arrangements played. The Boston Orchestra, according to Sir Hamilton, is held by the English as the best in America.

On the matter of radio broadcasting in England, Sir Hamilton waxed eloquent. He explained the difference in the American and English systems, pointing out that a government monopoly exists in England where one orchestra—the London Symphony—is chosen to handle all the air concerts. Sir Hamilton feels very strongly that the appropriation for this broadcasting should include the other leading British orchestras—that of the city of Birmingham, the Scottish symphony, and his own of Manchester which he believes leads all the rest. Greater variety of program would follow such a course of action. Sir Hamilton made it very clear that he was not attacking broadcasting, which he respects, but the way it is administered in England. In this country, he said, it is the fashion to support music; but not so in England where the people are not ready to spend money on orchestras.

SEES JAZZ ON WANE

As for jazz, the British conductor believes that it is on the wane and has not enough fundamental musical worth to make it endure. He admits, however, that he is partial to George Gershwin and his compositions.

As might have been expected, the mention of Hollywood brought forth the question of Sir Hamilton's attitude on the moving pictures. As in all other questions, his attitude was perfectly definite.

"I am not interested," he said. "Nor shall I be."

Sir Hamilton holds the degree of doctor of music in Trinity College, Dublin, and in Victoria University, Manchester. He is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.

Boston Orchestra, Americans Heard

Daniel Gregory Mason Makes Lists and Draws Conclusions

Transcript June 22

What leisure these professors of music must have, even if they are composers as well! Here into the June number of Musical America comes Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia toting up the number of pieces by American composers played within the five seasons of 1925-26, 26-27, 27-28, 28-29, 29-30, by the principal American orchestras and drawing from the lists such deductions as please him. He places first Chicago and the lesser orchestras of the Middle West; next Boston; then, at long interval, Philadelphia and New York. Here is his list from the program-books of the Boston Orchestra, with the proviso that for reasons nowhere made known, Mr. Mason does not count Mr. Loeffler an American composer. He has merely spent forty-odd years, it seems, of his working life in Boston, and Medfield. Nor, for a reason, quite obvious in his comments, will he count Mr. Bloch an American. Here is the list:

1925-26

Copland: "Music for the Theatre."*
Gilbert: Symphonic Piece.*
Spelman: "Assisi."*

1926-27

Chadwick: "Tam O'Shanter."
Converse: "Flivver 10,000,000"*
Copland: Concerto for Piano.*
Hill: "Lilacs."*
Sessions: Symphony.*
Steinert: "Southern Night."*

1927-28

Carpenter: "Adventures in a Perambulator," "Skyscrapers."
Converse: "California."*
Hill: "Symphony No. 1."*
Mason: Symphony No. 1.
Piston: Symphonic Piece.*

1928-29

Carpenter: "Skyscrapers."
Copland: Two Pieces for String Orchestra.
Foote: Suite for Strings.
Goldmark: Negro Rhapsody.
Hanson: Nordic Symphony.
Hill: Symphony No. 1.
Jacobi: Indian Dances.
Josten: Two Movements from "Concerto Sacro."
Schelling: "Morocco."

1929-30

Chadwick: Sinfonietta.
Eichheim: "Java" and "Burma."
Fairchild: "Chants Nègres."*
Gardner: "Broadway."*
Gruenberg: "Enchanted Isle."
Jazz Suite.
Hill: "Lilacs."
Josten: "Jungle."*
Piston: Suite for Orchestra.*

Total: 33 works.
(The stars indicate first performance)

Mr. Mason's comment is delightfully amusing indication of his faiths—in that slightly over-used word "constructive," for example—and of his prejudices—for instance against those whom he labels "cosmopolitan Jews": "Here again the roster of established composers is impressive: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goldmark, Gruenberg, Hanson, Hill, Mason, Schelling; and there is a fair proportion of local names: Foote Piston, Steinert. It is in the younger men chosen that a significant difference from Chicago [to which Mr. Mason gives first place] is noted: Copland, Fairchild, Gardner, Jacobi, Josten, Sessions, Spelman. Here the inclusion of such names as Copland, Gardner, Gruenberg, Fairchild, Spelman (the first three cosmopolitan Jews, the two latter expatriates) seems to give a more European, exotic flavor, to make the list, in spite of its New Englanders like Sessions and its New Yorkers like Goldmark, a little less representatively American.

"At the same time the great number of first performances tends to arouse our suspicions; while their presence in moderation indicates a healthy curiosity and independence of convention, over-insistence on them may proceed from a precisely opposite pandering to public opinion in the shape of the journalistic demand for novelty. Novelty may be sought through motives of sensationalism; while lasting and quiet artistic joy are compatible only with long familiarity: and a list rich in repetitions like that of Chicago may therefore be more truly constructive than one where 'New: First time' appears over-often."

Before leaving Mr. Mason, it may be worth while to note that the "Jazz Suite" of Mr. Gruenberg, the "Music for the Theater" and the Concerto of Mr. Copland, the "Broadway" of Mr. Gardner, bore on every other page the marks of urban America. It may be recorded also that all three composers have spent their working lives in and about New York. Mr. Mason harms a good cause when he lets anti-Semitic prejudice color his argument. Has it ever occurred to him that there are those who dislike New Englanders as much, and as unreasonably as he seems to dislike "cosmopolitan Jews?" When race-prejudices intrude into the concert-hall, it is time for just-minded persons to withdraw.

H. T. P.

MUSIC

Globe June 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Sir Hamilton Harty Conducts Pop Concert

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished Irish conductor and composer, serving as guest conductor of the season's final Sunday Pop concert last evening, received at the conclusion of the program one of the most fervid demonstrations of approval and admiration that one has witnessed lately in Symphony Hall. The eager and long-continued handclapping which had been accorded him earlier in the evening gave way to shouts of "Bravo" as the audience rose to its feet stamping and cheering.

His program comprised the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride"; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from Berlioz' opera "The Trojans"; the theme and variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 in G, and Sir Hamilton's symphonic poem "With The Wild Geese."

Tall and rather heavily-set, his manner when he first appeared upon the platform was modest and unassuming to the point of diffidence. A few bows, hardly more than quiet nods of the head, accompanied by his quiet friendly smile, and he turned to the orchestra. A curious contrast was presented between this modesty and the energetic, yet sensitive and tasteful manner in which he conducted.

His musicianship, to judge from last night's performance, is sound and unimpeachable. He has an abundance of exuberance but he does not use it to attract attention to himself.

His baton is used quite as much to indicate phrasing and dynamic values as to convey the proper tempo. In short, he presents a somewhat unusual and decidedly refreshing example of a conductor of temperament who shows it, but he is not of the showman type.

Sir Hamilton, who for a decade has conducted the celebrated Halle concerts at Manchester, Eng, and has been conductor of the London Symphony, is the son of an Irish organist, and has won renown in addition to composing and conducting for his skill as piano accompanist. He is said to admire more than any other composers Mozart and Berlioz.

This was evident in the sympathetic, painstaking and eloquent manner in which he played the music of those composers last evening. The Mozart was properly light and flowing, with not a little subtlety. The Berlioz was stimulating and forceful.

The Tchaikovsky variations, something in the nature of a test of virtuosity for conductor and players, were played with a brilliance and intensity—and in the waltz-like variations with consummate grace—that made one listener forget the barren stretches of dry thematic material. In the statement of the theme of the Brahms variations, however, the tempo seemed somewhat too slow, and the melody rather too angular.

Sir Hamilton's "With the Wild Geese" was received with enthusiasm. Written in 1910, it is somewhat long as compositions are written nowadays, but it has, especially in the parts of a pastoral character, passages of exquisite beauty and of extraordinary descriptive power. These portions are beautifully scored. While it is conventional in harmony, it has a freshness about it that many a piece full of the vagaries of ultra-modernism already has lost.

C. W. D.

Globe June 22

Cheers for Harty at Pops

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished conductor from England, led the Pops orchestra at Symphony Hall last night in a symphonic program, offering the unusual spectacle (hereabouts) of a guest conductor in June. There was a large audience, which did not, however, fill the hall—and it should have done so. But it did more than applaud this engaging Irish music-maker; it cheered him—as the phrase used to run—"to the echo."

Sir Hamilton drew his program from the music of Smetana, Brahms, Mozart, Berlioz and Chaikovsky. Incidentally he contributed one work himself—"With the Wild Geese." But well-chosen and varied as the music was, it was rather the quality of the conducting that stirred the listener. It was not the kind of conducting that attracted primarily the eye. Never have we observed a less self-conscious leader, a man more intent primarily on the task of making music.

If his gestures seemed awkward to the casual onlooker they seemed particularly appropriate to the musician. For this modest man moves and acts so that he may influence his orchestra players, not so that he may give visual interpretation of the music for the benefit of the audience. From this point of view his technic is irreproachable. All the while he is thoroughly enjoying himself—which a music-maker should. How the memory of his directing the orchestra in Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the beauty of the performance (on a single rehearsal) will remain after the fuming and fussing of many another!

Harty, The Pops

June 20

Eighth Week—Last evening, Sir Hamilton Harty, the eminent conductor of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester and London, arrived in Boston, to be guest of the Symphony Orchestra. Today he is busy with rehearsals. Tomorrow evening, with Mr. Fiedler as his willing host, he will conduct at Symphony Hall in his only concert in the Eastern half of America. On Monday he will start Westward to keep his engagements at Los Angeles and San Francisco. His program for Boston, printed elsewhere on these pages, is happy compromise between music for a Sunday Pop and music for a Symphony Concert. It gives room for Sir Hamilton's abilities as conductor; discloses him as composer; implies a responsive orchestra.

The incidents of the week—the last but one of the concerts—begin with a Russian program on Monday, full-freighted with Chaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov. The exceptional numbers are the scene between the young prince and the young princess—"they sat in the garden and talked of love"—from Rimsky's "Scheherazade" and the slow movement—"linked sweetness long drawn out"—from Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. . . . On Wednesday, as anticipated elsewhere on these pages, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will play numbers from Walton's music to the Sitwells' "Façade." Mr. Sanromá will also be heard for the first time in Weber's re-born "Concert-Piece," music inviting his more displayful talents. . . . On Thursday, there is room for the longer version of Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival"—ten numbers in all, with Messrs. Sanromá and Litwin as pianists. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Sanromá will again join together in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Week-End Pops

Program for Saturday

Rákóczy March ..... Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon," Weber
Londonderry Air ..... Harty
Tales from Johann Strauss ... Korngold
Overture, "The Year 1812" ... Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior" ..... Grossman
Selection from the Musical Play, "Rose-Marie" ..... Friml
March, "Under the Double Eagle" J. Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Program for Sunday

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Last of the Sunday Pop concerts: Sir Hamilton Harty, guest conductor. The program was as follows: Smetana, Overture to "The Bartered Bride;" Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a; Harty, "With the Wild Geese" (after a poem by Emily Lawless); Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525): Allegro, Romanzo, Menuetto, Rondo; Berlioz, "Royal Hunt and Tempest," Descriptive Symphony, from "The Trojans;" Tchaikovsky, Theme with Variations from Suite No. 3, Op. 55.

For his first appearance as guest conductor at the Pop concerts, Sir Hamilton Harty selected a program that met last evening with the warmest approval. Much of the music was familiar, saving his own composition, but the freshness and vigor with which it was played made it seem almost like new. Sir Hamilton Harty, as was to have been expected from his long and distinguished record abroad, is a conductor of resourcefulness and precision, handling with equal skill the exquisitely delicate tones of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusig" or the vigorous, even flashy, romanticism of Tchaikovsky's "Theme with Variations from Suite No. 3." Reserved in manner, almost austere, his acknowledgment of applause was gracious but brief; plainly his chief concern was with the rendition of the music by the orchestra under his control.

Much interest centered in the playing of the conductor's own composition, "ith the Wild Geese," suggested by a poem by Emily Lawless. There was a warmth and breeziness to this music that won instant approval. There was not too obvious a striving after concerto imagery, yet one could hear the honking of the geese as they passed overhead and even catch the rustle of their wings. Snatches of Irish folk-song identified the location of the piece and there were bursts of wild melody in a minor key that suggested autumn storms or perhaps a tumult in the land. There were no unpleasing discords, but neither, on the other hand, was everything soft and sweet; the music was restless, seeming to strive after a peace desired but never attained.

Brahms' arrangement of the stately theme by Hayln was played with a fine dignity that rought out all its majestic beauty. For sheer loveliness of tone, perhaps "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" stood out most emphatically; the miniature orchestra that played it showing full appreciation of its delicate precision and fine musicianship. The overture of "The Bartered Bride" was vigorously played, and the Tchaikovsky "Theme with Variations" concluded the concert in a burst of brass and Russian emotions. Alone, the selection from Berlioz' descriptive symphony, "The Trojans" seemed lacking in interest.

The completion of the program gave opportunity for the small but appreciative audience to give vent to the enthusiasm which had been accumulating during the concert. There was a veritable ovation, which brought Sir Hamilton Harty back again and again in response to the vociferous applause. Finally, everyone stood up, and one heard the noise of stamping, even of shouted "Bravos" an unusually emotional but thoroughly deserved tribute.

E. L. H.

The Guest in A Concert of Excitements

Sir Hamilton Harty Warms Orchestra and Audience At Symphony Hall

Such summer heat as visited this town from Friday afternoon until Sunday afternoon is the enemy of virtue in the concert-hall. On Saturday evening, as listener, Sir Hamilton Harty made first acquaintance with the Pop Concerts—and the smallest audience in a spring of full houses applauded his orchestral transcription of the "Londonderry Air." On Sunday evening, as guest-conductor, he himself led the orchestra through a light symphonic program—and again Symphony Hall was no more than half-full. (The two balconies, especially the ever-faithful upper tier, were liberally occupied.) The weather had indeed "moderated," as we say in New England, but too late to bring back the fugitives from seaside and countryside. The public of The Pops may have shied at Sir Hamilton's severer program—what with two sets of variations! The public of the Symphony Concerts, which should have been more numerous, comes not to town on a Sunday evening in June.

Possibly the guest, like other Northern Europeans, blessed with a climate that permits the public practice of the art of music through twelve months of the year, may have wondered at the relative suspension of concerts and operas in America with the incoming tide of spring. After that Friday and Saturday in New York and Boston, he may now understand. Doubtless from any cosmopolitan standpoint, we Americans make a comic fuss about our summer heats, as though we would have the world wonder at them. Yet as an atmosphere for concerts, they give us reason.

Happily there were offsets. . . . In the first place, at the rehearsal of Saturday morning—and we all know what our studies or our offices then were—the orchestra took an instant and a strong fancy to Sir Hamilton. Discerning with conductors, they knew him immediately for a leader of ability and experience, clear-minded as to what he wished, stout-willed to gain it. Almost as quickly they discovered that, by grace of his Irish blood, his ways with an orchestra were ingratiating and stimulating. Through three hours they worked for him whole-heartedly. The quickness of the Boston Orchestra to catch and accomplish a guest-conductor's wishes is familiar story from Boston to Berlin. Sir Hamilton may also have discovered that it can be as ready with good will.

On Sunday, freed from bodily discomfort and spurred by the occasion, it played above its summer self. More: at the end of the tone-poem and of the first part of the concert, it laid down its instruments; turned as one man toward the conductor-composer bowing his acknowledgments at the side of the stage; clapped him to the echo; beamed upon him; as though that were not enough, repeated the demonstration at the close of the concert. Not a whit behindhand was the audience. It welcomed Sir Hamilton warmly; heaped applause upon him after every number; twice added shouts to clapping; rose en masse to salute him while he made his final bows. More than once he was named for guest-conductor when Dr. Koussevitzky takes his holiday next winter. . . . The powers that be in the Symphony Orchestra did well when in "the off-season" they made opportunity for Sir Hamilton in the East. They acted—to transfer the army phrase—as officers and gentlemen. Nor can he doubt the temper of his audience. At the summer solstice, a stirring concert is possible in Boston.

Sir Hamilton is at ripe middle age, with graying hair—a tall, square-shouldered, firmly built figure. Toward the audience he has no manner, though he permits himself at moments an engaging Irish smile. Toward the orchestra he is equally unmannered. His right hand beats the measure clearly; his left, unobtrusively used, curves the melodic line or accents the rhythm. He turns quickly to spur a group or a choir from whom, for the moment, he expects much. He uses also Dr. Koussevitzky's familiar gesture—as from one who would draw the orchestra to himself, so infuse himself into it; thereby gain an urgent end. Through the first half of the concert, a listener might have said that ear and hand were most sensitive to the warmth and the richness of the woodwinds and the horns. Soon, however, the performance of Mozart's Serenade made plain that they were not less alert to the quality and finesse of string-tone.

The concert was indeed a succession of discoveries of Sir Hamilton in the practice of the art of conducting. He began with Smetana's Overture to the opera, "The Bartered Bride"—show-piece at Symphony Hall in Dr. Muck's time; played once or twice under Mr. Monteux; overlooked by Dr. Koussevitzky. It was good to hear again for the clear brightness of the Czech folk-tunes, the liveliness of the dance-rhythms, the light verve of the whole. Sir Hamilton enlarged and deepened the pleasure by his unaffected singing of the melodies, his spirited hand upon the dance-tunes, his sensibility in the varying of repeated measures or in the modulation of approaching climax.

Next the familiar variations of Brahms on the theme out of Haydn. Seldom at Symphony Hall has the theme been sung more limpidly and simply, with such beauty of tone from the woodwinds and horns. The Variations were admirably differentiated, as admirably charactered. Throughout Sir Hamilton was all for the lyric, clear-rhythmed, warm-colored, rich-textured Brahms. It is hard to remember when the two Variations vivace (VI. and VII.) have been so distinctively marked; when the Variation grazioso has sounded so felicitously; when the Finale has seemed such full-voiced and full-rounded epitome of the whole. In short a performance to remember.

Then Sir Hamilton as both conductor and composer in his tone-poem, "With the Wild Geese." Its origins in the poems of Emily Lawless, its backgrounds in Irish history and legend, have already been set forth in this place. As the music sounds, initial fanfares proclaim the exiled soldiery. A first division sings their stout hearts, keen wills, high spirits and warm temper. A second recalls the memories of country and Irish life that haunt them—memories that are also longing. Both these divisions proceed from Irish folk-song. Sir Hamilton translates it simply and warmly into the orchestral idiom of the first decade of the century; suffuses it with the intrinsic sentiment; keeps that sentiment direct and masculine; shuns pseudo-Irish softness and sweetness, be it Tom Moore's or that of the later Celtic poets. For him, "The Wild Geese" quit themselves in very truth as men.

The third division—of Fontenoy—is suggestion rather than battle-piece. "Heidenleben," with its swirl of dissonances across a stricken field, was no new thing in 1910; but Sir Hamilton could say, even to Strauss, "Get thee behind me, Sathanas." The finale is apotheosis of the returning shades,

". . . Singing from the fight,
Home to Corca Bascinn in the morning light."

But in the third and the fourth division Sir Hamilton is more reliant upon the common stock of music, A. D. 1910, than upon his own invention through Irish folk-tune. Finally, for an evening's wonder, hear a conductor-composer who scores for orchestra simply.

Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"—the little Serenade for strings, long repertory piece at Symphony Hall—began the second part of the concert. Sir Hamilton played it with a diminished and carefully balanced orchestra; was often singular in his pacing and phrasing; was superlatively sensitive to the return of the melody in the slow movement; sharpened the rhythms of the minuet; gained a Muck-like lightness and fleetness in the finale; in sum, achieved a highly individual "reading" that brushed away the over-sophistication and super-refinement nowadays besetting the lighter Mozart in performance; restored to this Serenade the true voice of fluent and fanciful improvisation.

Next to Berlioz—one of Sir Hamilton's loyalties—in the tone-picturing of the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" that conduct Dido and Æneas across the Carthaginian forest to the fated cave; while Naiads gambol in the sunshine or Fauns wave torches across the storm. "The Trojans" whence the piece comes, was work of Berlioz's final years. To some ears it seems a manufactured music born of thought, will and endless pains. But so to judge it is not to reproach Sir Hamilton's feeling for Berlioz's lean, meandering melody, his stripped harmonies, his pictorial suggestion by instrumental color and texture, his tour de force through "The Trojans" in the joining of Vergilian restraint to romantic feeling.

Finally, the theme, variations and Polonaise that end Chaikovsky's Suite in G major, unheard in Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's distant day. Sir Hamilton took them as virtuoso-piece for orchestral display; flung them off impetuously, springing from one to another as though Chaikovsky had written them at white and unbroken heat; even slurred the rhythm of the polonaise in his passion for speed and sonority; yet paused that Mr. Theodorowicz might play the folk-song variation with the skill and feeling that in another vein had distinguished Mr. Valkenier at the first horn in the number from Berlioz. . . . It is custom in America to think indifferently of English conductors. Here in Boston, first Sir Thomas Beecham and now Sir Hamilton Harty, "as guests," have redressed that injustice. H. T. P.

A covered wagon is ready to start this afternoon its trek across the continent in commemoration of 100 years of Baptist home mission service. This will be the beginning of a year's commemoration of the centenary of the American Home Mission Society. To recognize the part that Massachusetts Baptists played in the beginning of Baptist home mission work on this continent, it is planned to begin the centenary commemoration in this state.

Baptist Vehicle Will Trek Across Continent

COVERED WAGON TO START TODAY

to American composers and their works holds true in England. Hence Sir Hamilton hopes to act as an ambassador of music by introducing the contemporary music of the two countries to each other.

CONCERT TO BE HELD TONIGHT

Tonight he will enjoy the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Arthur Fiedler—and will have the pleasure of hearing one of his own arrangements played. The Boston Orchestra, according to Sir Hamilton, is held by the English as the best in America.

On the matter of radio broadcasting in England, Sir Hamilton waxed eloquent. He explained the difference in the American and English systems, pointing out that a government monopoly exists in England where one orchestra—the London Symphony—is chosen to handle all the air concerts. Sir Hamilton feels very strongly that the appropriation for this broadcasting should include the other leading British orchestras—that of the city of Birmingham, the Scottish symphony, and his own of Manchester which he believes leads all the rest. Greater variety of program would follow such a course of action. Sir Hamilton made it very clear that he was not attacking broadcasting, which he respects, but the way it is administered in England. In this country, he said, it is the fashion to support music; but not so in England where the people are not ready to spend money on orchestras.

SEES JAZZ ON WANE

As for jazz, the British conductor believes that it is on the wane and has not enough fundamental musical worth to make it endure. He admits, however, that he is partial to George Gershwin and his compositions.

As might have been expected, the mention of Hollywood brought forth the question of Sir Hamilton's attitude on the moving pictures. As in all other questions, his attitude was perfectly definite.

"I am not interested," he said. "Nor shall I be."

Sir Hamilton holds the degree of doctor of music in Trinity College, Dublin, and in Victoria University, Manchester. He is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.

Boston Orchestra, Americans Heard

Daniel Gregory Mason Makes Lists and Draws Conclusions

What leisure these professors of music must have, even if they are composers as well! Here into the June number of Musical America comes Daniel Gregory Mason of Columbia toting up the number of pieces by American composers played within the five seasons of 1925-26, 26-27, 27-28, 28-29, 29-30, by the principal American orchestras and drawing from the lists such deductions as please him. He places first Chicago and the lesser orchestras of the Middle West; next Boston; then, at long interval, Philadelphia and New York. Here is his list from the program-books of the Boston Orchestra, with the proviso that for reasons nowhere made known, Mr. Mason does not count Mr. Loeffler an American composer. He has merely spent forty-odd years, it seems, of his working life in Boston, and Medfield. Nor, for a reason, quite obvious in his comments, will he count Mr. Bloch an American. Here is the list:

1925-26

Copland: "Music for the Theatre."*
Gilbert: Symphonic Piece.*
Spelman: "Assisi."*

1926-27

Chadwick: "Tam O'Shanter."
Converse: "Flivver 10,000,000"*
Copland: Concerto for Piano.*
Hill: "Lilacs."*
Sessions: Symphony.*
Steinert: "Southern Night."*

1927-28

Carpenter: "Adventures in a Perambulator," "Skyscrapers."
Converse: "California."*
Hill: "Symphony No. 1."*
Mason: Symphony No. 1.
Piston: Symphonic Piece.*

1928-29

Carpenter: "Skyscrapers."
Copland: Two Pieces for String Orchestra.
Foote: Suite for Strings.
Goldmark: Negro Rhapsody.
Hanson: Nordic Symphony.
Hill: Symphony No. 1.
Jacobi: Indian Dances.
Josten: Two Movements from "Concerto Sacro."
Schelling: "Morocco."

1929-30

Chadwick: Sinfonietta.
Eichheim: "Java" and "Burma."
Fairchild: "Chants Nègres."*
Gardner: "Broadway."*
Gruenberg: "Enchanted Isle."
Jazz Suite.
Hill: "Lilacs."
Josten: "Jungle."*
Piston: Suite for Orchestra.*

Total: 33 works.

(The stars indicate first performance)

Mr. Mason's comment is delightfully amusing indication of his faiths—in that slightly over-used word "constructive," for example—and of his prejudices—for instance against those whom he labels "cosmopolitan Jews": "Here again the roster of established composers is impressive: Carpenter, Chadwick, Converse, Eichheim, Gilbert, Goldmark, Gruenberg, Hanson, Hill, Mason, Schelling; and there is a fair proportion of local names: Foote Piston, Steinert. It is in the younger men chosen that a significant difference from Chicago [to which Mr. Mason gives first place] is noted: Copland, Fairchild, Gardner, Jacobi, Josten, Sessions, Spelman. Here the inclusion of such names as Copland, Gardner, Gruenberg, Fairchild, Spelman (the first three cosmopolitan Jews, the two latter expatriates) seems to give a more European, exotic flavor, to make the list, in spite of its New Englanders like Sessions and its New Yorkers like Goldmark, a little less representatively American.

"At the same time the great number of first performances tends to arouse our suspicions; while their presence in moderation indicates a healthy curiosity and independence of convention, over-insistence on them may proceed from a precisely opposite pandering to public opinion in the shape of the journalistic demand for novelty. Novelty may be sought through motives of sensationalism; while lasting and quiet artistic joy are compatible only with long familiarity: and a list rich in repetitions like that of Chicago may therefore be more truly constructive than one where 'New: First time' appears over-often."

Before leaving Mr. Mason, it may be worth while to note that the "Jazz Suite" of Mr. Gruenberg, the "Music for the Theater" and the Concerto of Mr. Copland, the "Broadway" of Mr. Gardner, bore on every other page the marks of urban America. It may be recorded also that all three composers have spent their working lives in and about New York. Mr. Mason harms a good cause when he lets anti-Semitic prejudice color his argument. Has it ever occurred to him that there are those who dislike New Englanders as much, and as unreasonably as he seems to dislike "cosmopolitan Jews?" When race-prejudices intrude into the concert-hall, it is time for just-minded persons to withdraw. H. T. P.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sir Hamilton Harty Conducts Pop Concert

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished Irish conductor and composer, serving as guest conductor of the season's final Sunday Pop concert last evening, received at the conclusion of the program one of the most fervid demonstrations of approval and admiration that one has witnessed lately in Symphony Hall. The eager and long-continued handclapping which had been accorded him earlier in the evening gave way to shouts of "Bravo" as the audience rose to its feet stamping and cheering.

His program comprised the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride"; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from Berlioz' opera "The Trojans"; the theme and variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 in G, and Sir Hamilton's symphonic poem "With The Wild Geese."

Tall and rather heavily-set, his manner when he first appeared upon the platform was modest and unassuming to the point of diffidence. A few bows, hardly more than quiet nods of the head, accompanied by his quiet friendly smile, and he turned to the orchestra. A curious contrast was presented between this modesty and the energetic, yet sensitive and tasteful manner in which he conducted.

His musicianship, to judge from last night's performance, is sound and unimpeachable. He has an abundance of exuberance but he does not use it to attract attention to himself.

His baton is used quite as much to indicate phrasing and dynamic values as to convey the proper tempo. In short, he presents a somewhat unusual and decidedly refreshing example of a conductor of temperament who shows it, but he is not of the showman type.

Sir Hamilton, who for a decade has conducted the celebrated Halle concerts at Manchester, Eng, and has been conductor of the London Symphony, is the son of an Irish organist, and has won renown in addition to composing and conducting for his skill as piano accompanist. He is said to admire more than any other composers Mozart and Berlioz.

This was evident in the sympathetic, painstaking and eloquent manner in which he played the music of those composers last evening. The Mozart was properly light and flowing, with not a little subtlety. The Berlioz was stimulating and forceful.

The Tchaikovsky variations, something in the nature of a test of virtuosity for conductor and players, were played with a brilliance and intensity—and in the waltz-like variations with consummate grace—that made one listener forget the barren stretches of dry thematic material. In the statement of the theme of the Brahms variations, however, the tempo seemed somewhat too slow, and the melody rather too angular.

Sir Hamilton's "With the Wild Geese" was received with enthusiasm. Written in 1910, it is somewhat long as compositions are written nowadays, but it has, especially in the parts of a pastoral character, passages of exquisite beauty and of extraordinary descriptive power. These portions are beautifully scored. While it is conventional in harmony, it has a freshness about it that many a piece full of the vagaries of ultra-modernism already has lost. C. W. D.

Cheers for Harty at Pops

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished conductor from England, led the Pops orchestra at Symphony Hall last night in a symphonic program, offering the unusual spectacle (hereabouts) of a guest conductor in June. There was a large audience, which did not, however, fill the hall—and it should have done so. But it did more than applaud this engaging Irish music-maker; it cheered him—as the phrase used to run—"to the echo."

Sir Hamilton drew his program from the music of Smetana, Brahms, Mozart, Berlioz and Chaikovsky. Incidentally he contributed one work himself—"With the Wild Geese." But well-chosen and varied as the music was, it was rather the quality of the conducting that stirred the listener. It was not the kind of conducting that attracted primarily the eye. Never have we observed a less self-conscious leader, a man more intent primarily on the task of making music.

If his gestures seemed awkward to the casual onlooker they seemed particularly appropriate to the musician. For this modest man moves and acts so that he may influence his orchestra players, not so that he may give visual interpretation of the music for the benefit of the audience. From this point of view his technic is irreproachable. All the while he is thoroughly enjoying himself—which a music-maker should. How the memory of his directing the orchestra in Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the beauty of the performance (on a single rehearsal) will remain after the fuming and fussing of many another!

The Pops

Eighth Week—Last evening, Sir Hamilton Harty, the eminent conductor of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester and London, arrived in Boston, to be guest of the Symphony Orchestra. Today he is busy with rehearsals. Tomorrow evening, with Mr. Fiedler as his willing host, he will conduct at Symphony Hall in his only concert in the Eastern half of America. On Monday he will start Westward to keep his engagements at Los Angeles and San Francisco. His program for Boston, printed elsewhere on these pages, is happy compromise between music for a Sunday Pop and music for a Symphony Concert. It gives room for Sir Hamilton's abilities as conductor; discloses him as composer; implies a responsive orchestra.

The incidents of the week—the last but one of the concerts—begin with a Russian program on Monday, full-freighted with Chaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov. The exceptional numbers are the scene between the young prince and the young princess—"they sat in the garden and talked of love"—from Rimsky's "Scheherazade" and the slow movement—"linked sweetness long drawn out"—from Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. . . . On Wednesday, as anticipated elsewhere on these pages, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will play numbers from Walton's music to the Sitwells' "Façade." Mr. Sanromá will also be heard for the first time in Weber's re-born "Concert-Piece," music inviting his more displayful talents. . . . On Thursday, there is room for the longer version of Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival"—ten numbers in all, with Messrs. Sanromá and Litwin as pianists. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Fiedler and Mr. Sanromá will again join together in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Week-End Pops

Program for Saturday

Rákóczy March ..... Berlioz
Overture to the Opera, "Oberon," Weber
Londonderry Air ..... Harty
Tales from Johann Strauss ... Korngold
Overture, "The Year 1812" ... Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Czardas from the Opera, "Ghost of the Warrior" ..... Grossman
Selection from the Musical Play, "Rose-Marie" ..... Friml
March, "Under the Double Eagle" J. Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

Program for Sunday

Overture to the Opera, "The Bartered Bride" ..... Smetana
Variations on a Theme from Haydn Brahms
Tone-Poem, "With the Wild Geese" Harty
Eine kleine Nachtmusik .... Mozart (Serenade for String Orchestra)
Royal Hunt and Tempest from the Opera, "The Trojans" ..... Berlioz Finale (Theme with Variations) from the Suite in G major, No. 3 Chaikovsky

Conductor: H. Harty as Guest

Miami Attorney Expects Move to Settle His $50,000 Claim

MIAMI, Fla., June 21 (AP)—Vincent C. Giblin, Miami attorney said today he may have an announcement to make tomorrow regarding settlement of his $50,000 suit against Al Capone but that he had received no communication from Capone today.

Giblin announced yesterday he expected settlement over the week end on his action to collect money he said was due him as attorney fees. The attorney said he had received word a

IN AL CAPONE SUIT

LAW FIRM SEES ACTION

manticism of Chaikovsky's Symphony with Variations from Suite No. 3." Reserved in manner, almost austere, his acknowledgement of applause was gracious but brief; plainly his chief concern was with the rendition of the music by the orchestra under his control.

Much interest centered in the playing of the conductor's own composition, "ith the Wild Geese," suggested by a poem by Emily Lawless. There was a warmth and breeziness to this music that won instant approval. There was not too obvious a striving after concerto imagery, yet one could hear the honking of the geese as they passed overhead and even catch the rustle of their wings. Snatches of Irish folk-song identified the location of the piece and there were bursts of wild melody in a minor key that suggested autumn storms or perhaps a tumult in the land. There were no unpleasing discords, but neither, on the other hand, was everything soft and sweet; the music was restless, seeming to strive after a peace desired but never attained.

Brahms' arrangement of the stately theme by Hayln was played with a fine dignity that rought out all its majestic beauty. For sheer loveliness of tone, perhaps "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" stood out most emphatically; the miniature orchestra that played it showing full appreciation of its delicate precision and fine musicianship. The overture of "The Bartered Bride" was vigorously played, and the Tchaikovsky "Theme with Variations" concluded the concert in a burst of brass and Russian emotions. Alone, the selection from Berlioz' descriptive symphony, "The Trojans" seemed lacking in interest.

The completion of the program gave opportunity for the small but apprcciative audience to give vent to the enthusiasm which had been accumulating during the concert. There was a veritable ovation, which brought Sir Hamilton Harty back again and again in response to the vociferous applause. Finally, everyone stood up, and one heard the noise of stamping, even of shouted "Bravos" an unusually emotional but thoroughly deserved tribute. E. L. H.

Sports and Pastime for Modernists

'Facade' Emerges at The Pops, Various Young Hands Assisting

From June 20

FIVE years afterward we in Boston are to hear four numbers from "Facade." As long ago as 1926, William Walton, then a youthful composer, wrote the music to intersperse and accompany the recitation of poems by Edith Sitwell. On spring evenings in that year this blended entertainment drew modernist London to a hall in remotest Chelsea and Ernest Newman "wrote a piece" about the occasion that has become a semi-classic in the kind. In time Dr. Koussevitzky discovered Mr. Walton in the overture, "Portsmouth Point," now well established in the repertory at Symphony Hall. Forthwith he hinted at a performance of "Façade"; then hesitated since it would require a speaker for the poems—through a megaphone—and might, by an unmistakable flippancy, distress the ancients and honorables who still dot our symphonic audiences. Then came Mr. Walton's "Sinfonia Concertante" and Concerto for Viola—work of a maturer day—and "Façade" again receded into the background.

Hence Mr. Fiedler has now drawn it—or rather four numbers in an orchestral suite—for performance at The Pops on Wednesday evening next. Possibly this occasion is a first time in America. Certainly it is a first time in Boston. The four pieces are in order: a Tango, a Pasodobile or Spanish march; a Swiss Yodelling Song; a Polka. Two at least, perhaps all four, accompany or refer back to poems by Miss Sitwell who writes, almost needless to say, "the new poetry." Whether this verse will be recited—through the megaphone—is yet to be decided at Symphony Hall. Meanwhile Mr. Newman's article, originally printed in the Sunday Times of London, is sufficient introduction. But first the record: "Façade" was produced at the Chenil Galleries in London, on April 27, 1926. The audience was warned that it might regard "Façade" as an entertainment and that it need not repress any impulse to laugh if it felt one. The megaphone was placed in "the mouth of a big face painted half in white, half in pink, on the curtain. The orchestra, behind this curtain, consisted of piccolo, flute, clarinet, bass clarinet, saxophone, trumpet, violoncello and percussion." Now to Mr. Newman:

"How much I enjoyed the fun may be estimated from the fact that I—a critic—actually not only stayed to the end but added my voice and my umbrella to the clamor for encores of the best 'items' long after the official proceedings were finished. . . . Mr. Sitwell, in his prefatory remarks, half hinted, apologetically, that the speaker of the words might not be able to get them all 'over,' but that if we happened to miss any of them there was always the music to fall back upon. His scruples were unnecessary. It is true that against the jolly stridencies of Mr. Walton's scoring what we got from the megaphone was often sound rather than sense, but for my part I felt that one or two of the poems were rather improved than otherwise by our not being able to catch the words. We got the essential things all right, such as—

Or the sound of the onycha
When the phoca has the pica
In the palace of the Queen Chinee!

(from the 'Trio for Two Cats and a Trombone'). But really, the words mattered very little, in the majority of cases, as against the music.

"The experience was another illustration of how necessary it is to find the right instrument for a tune, in poetry as in music. If I have missed, in my study, the inner meaning of some of Miss Sitwell's ingeniously wrought verses, it was because in my innocence I read them as I would read ordinary poetry. Mr. Osbert Sitwell (if it were he at the back of the megaphone), showed me that they really demand a method of reading of their own. Get Kreisler to play one of Paul Whiteman's shirt-sleeves tunes on his violin, and the tune will sound nothing. Hear the free-and-easy thing on the trombone or the baritone saxophone, and you are bound to admit that it has its qualities and its virtues. With tunes, as with people, the clothes are almost as important as what is inside them. Now when I read this of Miss Sitwell's:

Long steel brass—
The white soldiers pass—
The light is braying like an ass.
See
The tall Spanish jade
With hair black as nightshade
Worn as a cockade!
Flee
Her eyes' gasconade
And her gown's parade
(As stiff as a brigade).
Tee-hee!

or this—

Beside the castanetted sea
Where stalks Il Capitaneo
Swaggart braggadocio
Sword and moustachio—
He
Is green as a cassada
And his hair is an Armada!

or this—

When,
Sir
Beelzebub called for his syllabub in the hotel at Hell,

the device of the broken line misses fire with me, because I am not used to that sort of thing in the poetry I was brought up on. But when the megaphone bellows the words at me with a sledge-hammer insistence on the 'See,' 'Flee,' 'When,' and 'Sir,' I get the poet's idea and, I must confess, enjoy it.

"These, in fact, are saxophone tunes, not violin melodies, and must be played on the right instrument, with the right technique, and in the right spirit. The reciter brought out also all sorts of queer delightful rhythms and cross-rhythms and unexpected stabbing accents that gave me, as a musician whose trade is in these things and who therefore knows what's what where they are concerned, vast delight. It is all very well for old-fashioned purists to say that poetry should not be read through a megaphone. The answer is that the Sitwells know what they are driving at better than we do, and that, beyond a doubt, Tuesday's reading of some of these poems gave a delight in them that we had not previously felt. To hear Osbert and the megaphone pounding out—

THE
Trumpet and the drum,
And the martial cornet come
To make the people dumb—
But WE
Won't wait for sly-foot night with a rhythm and an accent like that of a military march, was to see the poem—for the first time with many of us—from the poet's point of view.

"But the entertainment owed a great deal also to Mr. Walton's music. All knew of this young man's before Tuesday was a horrible quartet of his to-ton's serious music—if, indeed, that quartet was serious and was music, both of which I doubt. But as a musical joker he is a jewel of the first water. Not all the 'Façade' music came off, it is true. Some of it was too imitative of the sort of thing we used to hear in the great days of about 1920, when Mr. Diaghilev was writing—or at all events signing—those wonderful letters to the papers in which a new scheme of musical values was foreshadowed, Beethoven and Brahms and Elgar being reduced to the status of mere straphangers by the Stravinskys and Saties and Prokofievs and Milhauds of the new dawn. Here and there Mr. Walton could be seen diving into that sequestered and now stagnant pool and coming up with bits of Stravinsky sticking in his honest English hair; indeed, now and then the music was so like Stravinsky that it might have been written by Eric Fogg.

Continued on Page Eight

"But when the true-born Briton settled down to the true-born Briton's historic part of guying things that have a natural touch of absurdity about them, he was, as the modern stylist would say, priceless. Here is obviously a humorous musical talent of the first order; nothing so good in the mock-serious line of music has been heard for a long time as the 'Waltz,' the 'Polka,' the 'Yodelling Song' and 'I do like to be beside the seaside' and the deft workmanship, especially in the orchestration, made the heart of the listening musician glad.

"The curious thing was the happiness of the correspondence between all the factors of the affair. The music, the words, the megaphone, and the piquant phrasing of the lines by the reciter were as much bone of each other's bone and flesh of each other's flesh as the words and the music are of each other in 'Tristan' or 'Pelléas.' At its best, 'Façade' was the jolliest entertainment of the season. . . . And Mr. Walton ought to seek out a librettist after his own heart and give us a little musical comedy in the jazz style."

There is only to add, on the part of The Transcript, two of Miss Sitwell's poems, directly associated with as many numbers to be played next Wednesday. One, "Neptune," goes with the Polka:

"'Tra la la la—
See me dance the polka.'
Said Mr. Wagg like a bear,
'With my top hat
And my whiskers that—
(Tra la la la) trap the Fair.

Where the waves seem chiming haycocks
I dance the polka; there
Stand Venus' children in their gay frocks,— Maroon and marine,—and stare.

To see me fire my pistol
Through the distance blue as my coat;
Like Wellington, Byron, the Marquis of Bristol,
Buzbied great trees float.

While the wheezing hurdy-gurdy
Of the marine wind blows me
To the tune of Annie Rooney, sturdy,
Over the sheafs of sea;

And bright as a seedsman's packet
With zinnias, candytufts chill,
Is Mrs. Marigold's jacket
As she gapes at the inn door still,

Where at dawn in the box of the sailor,
Blue as the decks of the sea,
Nelson awoke, crowed like the cocks,
Then back to dust sank he.

And Robinson Crusoe
Rues so
The bright and foxy beer.—
But he finds fresh isles in a negress' smiles,—
The poxy doxy dear,

As they watch me dance the polka,'
Said Mr. Wagg like a bear,
'In my top hat and my whiskers that,—
Tra la la, la, trap the Fair.

Tra la la la la—
Tra la la la la—
Tra la la la la la la la
La
La
La!'"

The other "Centaurs and Centauresses," is the verse for the "Swiss Yodelling Song":

"We bear velvet cream,
Green and babyish
Small leaves seem; each stream
Horses' tails that swish,

And the chimes remind
Us of sweet birds singing,
Like the jangling bells
On rose trees ringing.

Man must say farewell
To parents now,
And to William Tell,
And Mrs. Cow.

Man must say farewells
To storks and Bettes,
And to roses' bells,
And statuettes.

Forests white and black
In spring are blue
With forget-me-nots,
And to lovers true.

Still the sweet bird begs
And tries to cozen
Them: 'Buy angels' eggs
Sold by the dozen.'

Gone are clouds like inns
On the gardens' brinks,
And the mountain djinns,— Ganymede sells drinks;

While the days seem grey,
And his heart of ice,
Grey as chamois, or
The edelweiss,

And the mountain streams
Like cowbells sound—
Tirra lirra, drowned
In the waiter's dreams

Who has gone beyond
The forest waves,
While his true and fond Ones seek their graves."

Sir Hamilton Harty in Boston

Monitor June 22

By L. A. SLOPER

IF SIR HAMILTON HARTY was warned, before embarking for America, that he must expect frigidity in an audience assembled in Symphony Hall, Boston, he must have been pleasantly surprised on the evening of June 21. Appearing then as conductor of the final Pop concert of the season, he received a tumultuous welcome. Even at Hollywood Bowl, whither he is bound, he can hardly look for greater enthusiasm.

Making in Boston his first appearance in the United States as a conductor, Sir Hamilton was greeted with the warmth due to his distinguished position in Great Britain. But the intensified plaudits which came later in the evening must be attributed not to his reputation but to his performance. After his own tone poem, "With the Wild Geese," which closed the first half of his program, there was a storm of "Bravos"; and after the final number, Tchaikovsky's Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3, orchestra and audience rose to their feet to tender a prolonged ovation.

A Critical Audience

But this, carpers may urge in depreciation, was not a subscription symphony audience. No; but the audience of the Sunday evening "symphonic" programs of the Pops season is a critical group. It contains many musicians and music lovers who are regular patrons of the symphony concerts. Its approval is not too easily won. Moreover, it should be considered that the visitor's success was achieved with an orchestra reduced to rank-and-file by the absence of nearly all its "firsts." The guest conductor, without doubt, would be the first to acknowledge the credit due to these fine players, drilled by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose respect and liking he had obviously won in the single rehearsal allowed him. Indeed, he was generous in sharing the applause with them.

Sir Hamilton's qualities as leader and as musician were made evident at once in the Overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," which held robust humor and rhythmic vitality and a warm lyricism, besides bringing out a precision and a tonal quality which are not always conspicuous at excellent impression was strengthened by the performance of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, in which the conductor displayed a subtle sense of structural proportion as well as a keen feeling for phrase and accent.

"With the Wild Geese"

Interest centered naturally in the conductor's tone poem, based on the Emily Lawless verses about the Irish expatriates who fought with the enemies of England on the continent. This item, new to Boston, proved to be a well-made and effective score in conservative style, with more of Wagner and Liszt in it than of Strauss. This is not to intimate that the work is merely derivative. It is instinct with the sentiment, the gayety, the pugnaciousness and the melancholy of the Irish race. The battle scene, naturally, is the least interesting of the four movements into which it is divided. The introductory movement is captivating, with its evocation of the racial characteristics of the exiles. One must confess to a disappointment in the final section, which seemed rather too realistic for a depiction of the ghostly return. The second section, haunting and nostalgic, is the loveliest of all. Here the composer has achieved some extraordinarily suggestive writing for four horns (piano) and has enhanced his effect by the use of kettledrums played with finger tips.

As the reputed high priest of Berlioz in England, Sir Hamilton understandably included in his program the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans." Even those of us who have not been moved to join the Berlioz camp could not resist the charm of the quiet opening and close of the extract as revealed under the baton of this conductor, who has an extraordinary ability to bring out subtleties of mood. The Tchaikovsky item made a rousing conclusion, but memory travels back to the performance (with an orchestra of chamber proportions) of Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" as the high point of the evening. A versatile conductor, this, who can ride the storm with Berlioz and Tchaikovsky, and give so exquisitely phrased and balanced a performance of this "test piece." Hollywood is fortunate to have him

SIR HAMILTON HARTY ARRIVES IN BOSTON

Will Conduct Pop Concert Tomorrow Night

Globe June 22

Visiting Boston to direct one Pop concert tomorrow night before he starts on his concert tour of the West Coast, Sir Hamilton Harty of Manchester, Eng, one of the British Empire's greatest orchestral directors, arrived yesterday afternoon at the Copley-Plaza.

Sir Hamilton, who conducts the Halle Orchestra in Manchester, the group which is acknowledged to be the most outstanding orchestra in England today, is a lecturer at the University of Liverpool and holds the degree of Doctor of Music from Trinity College, Dublin, and Manchester University, and is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.

He looks athletic, and is well tanned. He talks easily and is evidently in this country (which he has not visited in 20 years) to see all there is to see and to hear all the modern works of American composers that he can be-

[illegible] the music here, he replied that it was the radio of the two countries that had the greatest influence on the music of the country as a whole, as far as the greater part of the people was concerned.

"The broadcasting situation in England is deplorable as far as real music can be offered to the people at large. Radio there is practically a Government monopoly, as it might be called. It is administered to the people of the country by semi-amateurs in music—in fact, the director general often has said in public that he knows little, if anything, about music.

"Then, too, the authorities are trying to centralize orchestral music in London with the British Broadcasting Company, and leave us others out of it entirely. The rest of England has been rather starved for the sake of London, where the orchestra is supported by about $500,000 annually in public funuds, while the other good orchestras, of which there are three, are forced to struggle along as best they can. Many of us think that to use public money to establish such a monopoly is quite indefensible.

"Understand—I am not attacking broadcasting in general, but only the administration of British broadcasting, which I believe does no good to music and to music-lovers. The same support should be given to all English orchestras, where in London or in other parts of the country."

First-Class English Orchestras

Sir Hamilton pointed out that in England today there are about four "really first-class" orchestras, each serving a separate quarter of the Nation. They are the Halle Orchestra in Manchester, about 75 years old; London Symphony, Scottish Orchestra, which plays at Glasgow and Edinboro, and the orchestra of the city of Birmingham.

To have given all of these an equal chance to expand, both in size and excellence, in the halls and on the radio, would have served the people better, according to the views of the visiting conductor.

"An Englishman likes to buy only what he can sell again," he said, "and that is why in England, where many kinds of art are not without their supporters, music is practically destitute. Here in America you spend much more money on symphonic orchestras than we do over there. I believe that that is just the fashion now, and it is not the fashion in England."

Sir Hamilton has brought many [illegible]sh modern works with him, to in[illegible]ice them to the American public, [illegible]he hopes to take American mu[illegible]ack to England with him, to give Nations a better understanding [illegible]he other's music.

[illegible] will conduct one concert at Sym[illegible]y Hall tomorrow night, and will [illegible]rse with the Boston Symphony [illegible]estra today. At Symphony Hall [illegible]ht he will be a guest, and Con[illegible]r Arthur Fiedler will play as a [illegible]esy to him Sir Hamilton's own [illegible]gement of the "Londonderry

[illegible]er his concert Sunday night, he [illegible] leave immediately for the West, [illegible]e he will play one concert at San [illegible]isco, one at San Mateo, and then [illegible]eries of 12 at Hollywood. After [illegible]he will return to San Francisco [illegible]or one more engagement, and then leave for Manchester, to open his own season.

FORESTERS APPOINT HONORARY DEPUTIES

The high standing committee of the Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters met last night at the headquarters, 17 Worcester st, South End, and appointed several honorary deputy high chief rangers. These appointees have seen service in the order for many years.

John Brant, John Hayes, William P. Hayes, George Stuart, Hon P. Sarsfield Cunniff, Timothy J. Collins, Charles Hurley, Hon Patrick Keating, Charles E. Benning, John F. Harrigan, Cornelius Duggan, James Dignan, Joseph T. Brennan, George T. Daly, James H. Benson, John W. Connolly, William J. Sullivan, Thomas F. Haley, James E. O'Leary, Dr Helen I. McGillicuddy, John H. O'Hara, Patrick J. McArdle, Mary A. Costello, Peter A. Walsh, James A. Donovan and Joseph P. McCabe.

John Brant is the veteran of the group, having served on the High Standing Committee in 1885-86.

229

A Lofty Program for Pops

Globe June 21

By Morris Hastings

THE POPS concert puts on its best bib and tucker when Sir Herbert Hamilton Harty takes over the baton as guest conductor for tonight's performance in Symphony Hall.

The titled visitor, in America to conduct some concerts at the Hollywood Bowl, is highly regarded in England where he has directed the Halle Orchestra of Manchester for 11 years.

Sir Herbert is already known in this country as an excellent pianist and a capable arranger of the folktunes of his native Ireland.

Even a hasty study of the program which Sir Herbert has chosen to play tonight leads one to the conclusion that the English take their summer music more seriously than Americans do. The Boston Symphony subscribers indeed could detect no flaw should Dr. Koussevitzky present the same program at the height of the winter season.

Gay Beginning

The concert opens with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which for all its flow of melody and its lightheartedness, contains some enormously superior writing. This is followed by Brahms' fine "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

The conductor makes himself known as composer by "With the Wild Geese," a score of symphonic proportions based on a poem by Emily Lawless. Then comes Mozart's exquisite serenade for string orchestra "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," of which Ernest Newman might have been writing when he said that Mozart's music "gives us the sensation of some ideal dance of nature's forces at their most ethereal."

In contrast, there is the typically tumultuous and heavy-handed "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from the pen of Hector Berlioz—a work which bears the subtitle "Descriptive Symphony" and is snatched from the composer's opera, "The Trojans."

The program is brought to a conclusion with Tschaikowsky's graceful "Theme with Variations from Suite Number 3."

Mr. Fiedler, who resumes his duties on Monday night, seems inspired by so lofty a program, and follows it up with a Russian bill, which includes stunning compositions by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, Stravinsky, Tschaikowsky and Glazounov.

On Wednesday, he presents a... interesting novelty in the shape of "Facades," a setting of some curious Edith Sitwell poems by William Walton. The same evening the brilliant Sanroma appears as soloist in Weber's romantic "Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra."

The Pops season ends on July th. Tonight is the final Sunday evening program.

Sports and Pastime for Modernists

'Facade' Emerges at The Pops, Various Young Hands Assisting

FIVE years afterward we in Boston are to hear four numbers from "Facade." As long ago as 1926, William Walton, then a youthful composer, wrote the music to intersperse and accompany the recitation of poems by Edith Sitwell. On spring evenings in that year this blended entertainment drew modernist London to a hall in remotest Chelsea and Ernest Newman "wrote a piece" about the occasion that has become a semi-classic in the kind. In time Dr. Koussevitzky discovered Mr. Walton in the overture, "Portsmouth Point," now well established in the repertory at Symphony Hall. Forthwith he hinted at a performance of "Façade"; then hesitated since it would require a speaker for the poems—through a megaphone—and might, by an unmistakable flippancy, distress the ancients and honorables who still dot our symphonic audiences. Then came Mr. Walton's "Sinfonia Concertante" and Concerto for Viola—work of a maturer day—and "Façade" again receded into the background.

Hence Mr. Fiedler has now drawn it—or rather four numbers in an orchestral suite—for performance at The Pops on Wednesday evening next. Possibly the occasion is a first time in America. Certainly it is a first time in Boston. The four pieces are in order: a Tango, a Pasodobile or Spanish march; a Swiss Yodelling Song; a Polka. Two at least, perhaps all four, accompany or refer back to poems by Miss Sitwell who writes, almost needless to say, "the new poetry." Whether this verse will be recited—through the megaphone—is yet to be decided at Symphony Hall. Meanwhile Mr. Newman's article, originally printed in the Sunday Times of London, is sufficient introduction. But first the record: "Façade" was produced at the Chenil Galleries in London, on April 27, 1926. The audience was warned that it might regard "Façade" as an entertainment and that it need not repress any impulse to laugh if it felt one. The megaphone was placed in "the mouth of a big face painted half in white, half in pink, on the curtain. The orchestra, behind this curtain, consisted of piccolo, flute, clarinet, bass clarinet, saxophone, trumpet, violoncello and percussion." Now to Mr. Newman:

"How much I enjoyed the fun may be estimated from the fact that I—a critic—actually not only stayed to the end but added my voice and my umbrella to the clamor for encores of the best 'items' long after the official proceedings were finished. . . . Mr. Sitwell, in his prefatory remarks, half hinted, apologetically, that the speaker of the words might not be able to get them all 'over,' but that if we happened to miss any of them there was always the music to fall back upon. His scruples were unnecessary. It is true that against the jolly stridencies of Mr. Walton's scoring what we got from the megaphone was often sound rather than sense, but for my part I felt that one or two of the poems were rather improved than otherwise by our not being able to catch the words. We got the essential things all right, such as—

Or the sound of the onycha
When the phoca has the pica
In the palace of the Queen Chinee!

(from the 'Trio for Two Cats and a Trombone'). But really, the words mattered very little, in the majority of cases, as against the music.

"The experience was another illustration of how necessary it is to find the right instrument for a tune, in poetry as in music. If I have missed, in my study, the inner meaning of some of Miss Sitwell's ingeniously wrought verses, it was because in my innocence I read them as I would read ordinary poetry. Mr. Osbert Sitwell (if it were he at the back of the megaphone), showed me that they really demand a method of reading of their own. Get Kreisler to play one of Paul Whiteman's shirt-sleeves tunes on his violin, and the tune will sound nothing. Hear the free-and-easy thing on the trombone or the baritone saxophone, and you are bound to admit that it has its qualities and its virtues. With tunes, as with people, the clothes are almost as important as what is inside them. Now when I read this of Miss Sitwell's:

Long steel brass—
The white soldiers pass—
The light is braying like an ass.
See
The tall Spanish jade
With hair black as nightshade
Worn as a cockade!
Flee
Her eyes' gasconade
And her gown's parade
(As stiff as a brigade).
Tee-hee!

or this—

Beside the castanetted sea
Where stalks Il Capitaneo
Swaggart braggadocio
Sword and moustachio—
He
Is green as a cassada
And his hair is an Armada!

or this—

When,
Sir
Beelzebub called for his syllabub in the hotel at Hell,

the device of the broken line misses fire with me, because I am not used to that sort of thing in the poetry I was brought up on. But when the megaphone bellows the words at me with a sledge-hammer insistence on the 'See,' 'Flee,' 'When,' and 'Sir,' I get the poet's idea and, I must confess, enjoy it.

"These, in fact, are saxophone tunes, not violin melodies, and must be played on the right instrument, with the right technique, and in the right spirit. The reciter brought out also all sorts of queer delightful rhythms and cross-rhythms and unexpected stabbing accents that gave me, as a musician whose trade is in these things and who therefore knows what's what where they are concerned, vast delight. It is all very well for old-fashioned purists to say that poetry should not be read through a megaphone. The answer is that the Sitwells know what they are driving at better than we do, and that, beyond a doubt, Tuesday's reading of some of these poems gave us a delight in them that we had not previously felt. To hear Osbert and the megaphone pounding out—

THE
Trumpet and the drum,
And the martial cornet come
To make the people dumb—
But WE
Won't wait for ally-foot night with a rhythm and an accent like that of a military march, was to see the poems—for the first time with many of us—from the poet's point of view.

"But the entertainment owed a great deal also to Mr. Walton's music. All I knew of this young man's before Tuesday was a horrible quartet of his that ton's serious music—if, indeed, that quartet was serious and was music, both of which I doubt. But as a musical joker he is a jewel of the first water. Not all the 'Façade' music came off, it is true. Some of it was too imitative of the sort of thing we used to hear in the great days of about 1920, when Mr. Diaghilev was writing—or at all events signing—those wonderful letters to the papers in which a new scheme of musical values was foreshadowed, Beethoven and Brahms and Elgar being reduced to the status of mere straphangers by the Stravinskys and Saties and Prokofievs and Milhauds of the new dawn. Here and there Mr. Walton could be seen diving into that sequestered and now stagnant pool and coming up with bits of Stravinsky sticking in his honest English hair; indeed, now and then the music was so like Stravinsky that it might have been written by Eric Fogg.

Continued on Page Eight

"But when the true-born Briton settled down to the true-born Briton's historic part of guying things that have a natural touch of absurdity about them, he was, as the modern stylist would say, priceless. Here is obviously a humorous musical talent of the first order; nothing so good in the mock-serious line of music has been heard for a long time as the 'Waltz,' the 'Polka,' the 'Yodelling Song' and 'I do like to be beside the seaside,' and the deft workmanship, especially in the orchestration, made the heart of the listening musician glad.

"The curious thing was the happiness of the correspondence between all the factors of the affair. The music, the words, the megaphone, and the piquant phrasing of the lines by the reciter were as much bone of each other's bone and flesh of each other's flesh as the words and the music are of each other in 'Tristan' or 'Pelléas.' At its best, 'Façade' was the jolliest entertainment of the season. . . . And Mr. Walton ought to seek out a librettist after his own heart and give us a little musical comedy in the jazz style."

There is only to add, on the part of The Transcript, two of Miss Sitwell's poems, directly associated with as many numbers to be played next Wednesday. One, "Neptune," goes with the Polka:

"'Tra la la la—
See me dance the polka,'
Said Mr. Wagg like a bear,
'With my top hat
And my whiskers that—
(Tra la la la) trap the Fair.

Blue as the decks of [illegible]
Nelson awoke, crowed like the cocks,
Then back to dust sank he.

And Robinson Crusoe
Rues so
The bright and foxy beer.—
But he finds fresh isles in a negress' smiles,—
The poxy doxy dear.

As they watch me dance the polka,'
Said Mr. Wagg like a bear,
'In my top hat and my whiskers that,—
Tra la la la, trap the Fair.

Tra la la la la—
Tra la la la la—
Tra la la la la la la la
La
La
La!'"

The other "Centaurs and Centauresses," is the verse for the "Swiss Yodelling Song":

"We bear velvet cream,
Green and babyish
Small leaves seem; each stream
Horses' tails that swish,

And the chimes remind
Us of sweet birds singing,
Like the jangling bells
On rose trees ringing.

Man must say farewell
To parents now,
And to William Tell,
And Mrs. Cow.

Man must say farewells
To storks and Bettes,
And to roses' bells,
And statuettes.

Forests white and black
In spring are blue
With forget-me-nots,
And to lovers true.

Still the sweet bird begs
And tries to cozen
Them: 'Buy angels' eggs
Sold by the dozen.'

MISS LOUISE FAY, Principal
321 Lexington Street
Waltham, Mass.

ADVANCED BUSINESS COURSES College Preparatory Courses
New Hampton
A NEW HAMPSHIRE SCHOOL FOR BOYS

110th year. Careful personal supervision. Strong, experienced faculty. Fully coached athletics. Unexcelled location. 110 miles from Boston. 150 boys from 19 States. Modern equipment. Moderate tuition.
For catalog address
FREDERICK SMITH, Box 203, New Hampton, N. H.

Sir Hamilton Harty in Boston

By L. A. SLOPER

IF SIR HAMILTON HARTY was warned, before embarking for America, that he must expect frigidity in an audience assembled in Symphony Hall, Boston, he must have been pleasantly surprised on the evening of June 21. Appearing then as conductor of the final Pop concert of the season, he received a tumultuous welcome. Even at Hollywood Bowl, whither he is bound, he can hardly look for greater enthusiasm.

Making in Boston his first appearance in the United States as a conductor, Sir Hamilton was greeted with the warmth due to his distinguished position in Great Britain. But the intensified plaudits which came later in the evening must be attributed not to his reputation but to his performance. After his own tone poem, "With the Wild Geese," which closed the first half of his program, there was a storm of "Bravos"; and after the final number, Tchaikovsky's Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3, orchestra and audience rose to their feet to tender a prolonged ovation.

A Critical Audience

But this, carpers may urge in depreciation, was not a subscription symphony audience. No; but the audience of the Sunday evening "symphonic" programs of the Pops season is a critical group. It contains many musicians and music lovers who are regular patrons of the symphony concerts. Its approval is not too easily won. Moreover, it should be considered that the visitor's success was achieved with an orchestra reduced to rank-and-file by the absence of nearly all its "firsts." The guest conductor, without doubt, would be the first to acknowledge the credit due to these fine players, drilled by Dr. Koussevitzky, whose respect and liking he had obviously won in the single rehearsal allowed him. Indeed, he was generous in sharing the applause with them.

Sir Hamilton's qualities as leader and as musician were made evident at once in the Overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," which held robust humor and rhythmic vitality and a warm lyricism, besides bringing out a precision and a tonal quality which are not always conspicuous at this point in the Pops season. This excellent impression was strengthened by the performance of Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, in which the conductor displayed a subtle sense of structural proportion as well as a keen feeling for phrase and accent.

"With the Wild Geese"

Interest centered naturally in the conductor's tone poem, based on the Emily Lawless verses about the Irish expatriates who fought with the enemies of England on the continent. This item, new to Boston, proved to be a well-made and effective score in conservative style, with more of Wagner and Liszt in it than of Strauss. This is not to intimate that the work is merely derivative. It is instinct with the sentiment, the gayety, the pugnaciousness and the melancholy of the Irish race. The battle scene, naturally, is the least interesting of the four movements into which it is divided. The introductory movement is captivating, with its evocation of the racial characteristics of the exiles. One must confess to a disappointment in the final section, which seemed rather too realistic for a depiction of the ghostly return. The second section, haunting and nostalgic, is the loveliest of all. Here the composer has achieved some extraordinarily suggestive writing for four horns (piano) and has enhanced his effect by the use of kettledrums played with finger tips.

As the reputed high priest of Berlioz in England, Sir Hamilton understandably included in his program the "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from "The Trojans." Even those of us who have not been moved to join the Berlioz camp could not resist the charm of the quiet opening and close of the extract as revealed under the baton of this conductor, who has an extraordinary ability to bring out subtleties of mood. The Tchaikovsky item made a rousing conclusion, but memory travels back to the performance (with an orchestra of chamber proportions) of Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" as the high point of the evening. A versatile conductor, this, who can ride the storm with Berlioz and Tchaikovsky, and give so exquisitely phrased and balanced a performance of this "test piece." Hollywood is fortunate to have him in prospect.

POEMS WORTH READING

Abdication of William II

Column Reader, Natick—The former German Kaiser was not banished. On Nov 9, 1918, two days before the armistice was signed his abdication was announced. The next day he left Germany for Holland where he has since lived. There was no need for [illegible] persons banished.

First-Class Englis[illegible]

Sir Hamilton pointed out that in England today there are about four "really first-class" orchestras, each serving a separate quarter of the Nation. They are the Halle Orchestra in Manchester, about 75 years old; London Symphony, Scottish Orchestra, which plays at Glasgow and Edinboro, and the orchestra of the city of Birmingham.

To have given all of these an equal chance to expand, both in size and excellence, in the halls and on the radio, would have served the people better, according to the views of the visiting conductor.

"An Englishman likes to buy only what he can sell again," he said, "and that is why in England, where many kinds of art are not without their supporters, music is practically destitute. Here in America you spend much more money on symphonic orchestras than we do over there. I believe that that is just the fashion now, and it is not the fashion in England."

Sir Hamilton has brought many English modern works with him, to introduce them to the American public, and he hopes to take American music back to England with him, to give both Nations a better understanding of the other's music.

He will conduct one concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow night, and will rehearse with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today. At Symphony Hall tonight he will be a guest, and Conductor Arthur Fiedler will play as a courtesy to him Sir Hamilton's own arrangement of the "Londonderry Air."

After his concert Sunday night, he will leave immediately for the West, where he will play one concert at San Francisco, one at San Mateo, and then the series of 12 at Hollywood. After that he will return to San Francisco for one more engagement, and then leave for Manchester, to open his own season.

Visiting Boston to direct one Pop concert tomorrow night before he starts on his concert tour of the West Coast, Sir Hamilton Harty of Manchester, Eng, one of the British Empire's greatest orchestral directors, arrived yesterday afternoon at the Copley-Plaza.

Sir Hamilton, who conducts the Halle Orchestra in Manchester, the group which is acknowledged to be the most outstanding orchestra in England today, is a lecturer at the University of Liverpool and holds the degree of Doctor of Music from Trinity College, Dublin, and Manchester University, and is a Fellow of the Royal College of Music.

He looks athletic, and is well tanned. He talks easily and is evidently in this country (which he has not visited in 20 years) to see all there is to see and to hear all the modern works of American composers that he can before he goes back to his season's work in Manchester next Fall.

"It is unfair," said the Irish musical leader with a smile, "to ask me whether I prefer English modern works to those of America, because I have not yet heard the latter and I must hear the music of your country before I judge.

To Shun Motion Pictures

"When I go to the West Coast, and to Hollywood, to be the guest conductor there for a two weeks' series of concerts in the famous Hollywood Rose Bowl, I intend to have nothing to do with the motion pictures. I never have, and I never expect to. It is not in my line."

When Sir Hamilton was asked concerning the main difference between music in England and the music here, he replied that it was the radio of the two countries that had the greatest influence on the music of the country as a whole, as far as the greater part of the people was concerned.

"The broadcasting situation in England is deplorable as far as real music can be offered to the people at large. Radio there is practically a Government monopoly, as it might be called. It is administered to the people of the country by semi-amateurs in music—in fact, the director general often has said in public that he knows little, if anything, about music.

"Then, too, the authorities are trying to centralize orchestral music in London with the British Broadcasting Company, and leave us others out of it entirely. The rest of England has been rather starved for the sake of London, where the orchestra is supported by about $500,000 annually in public funuds, while the other good orchestras, of which there are three, are forced to struggle along as best have handbags like these in the old days.

FORESTERS APPOINT HONORARY DEPUTIES

The high standing committee of the Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters met last night at the headquarters, 17 Worcester st, South End, and appointed several honorary deputy high chief rangers. These appointees have seen service in the order for many years.

John Brant, John Hayes, William P. Hayes, George Stuart, Hon P. Sarsfield Cunniff, Timothy J. Collins, Charles Hurley, Hon Patrick Keating, Charles E. Benning, John F. Harrigan, Cornelius Duggan, James Dignan, Joseph T. Brennan, George T. Daly, James H. Benson, John W. Connolly, William J. Sullivan, Thomas F. Haley, James E. O'Leary, Dr Helen I. McGillicuddy, John H. O'Hara, Patrick J. McArdle, Mary A. Costello, Peter A. Walsh, James A. Donovan and Joseph P. McCabe.

John Brant is the veteran of the group, having served on the High Standing Committee in 1885-86.

A Lofty Program for Pops

By Morris Hastings

THE POPS concert puts on its best bib and tucker when Sir Herbert Hamilton Harty takes over the baton as guest conductor for tonight's performance in Symphony Hall.

The titled visitor, in America to conduct some concerts at the Hollywood Bowl, is highly regarded in England where he has directed the Halle Orchestra of Manchester for 11 years.

Sir Herbert is already known in this country as an excellent pianist and a capable arranger of the folktunes of his native Ireland.

Even a hasty study of the program which Sir Herbert has chosen to play tonight leads one to the conclusion that the English take their summer music more seriously than Americans do. The Boston Symphony subscribers indeed could detect no flaw should Dr. Koussevitzky present the same program at the height of the winter season.

Gay Beginning

The concert opens with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which for all its flow of melody and its lightheartedness, contains some enormously superior writing. This is followed by Brahms' fine "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

The conductor makes himself known as composer by "With the Wild Geese," a score of symphonic proportions based on a poem by Emily Lawless. Then comes Mozart's exquisite serenade for string orchestra "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," of which Ernest Newman might have been writing when he said that Mozart's music "gives us the sensation of some ideal dance of nature's forces at their most ethereal."

In contrast, there is the typically tumultuous and heavy-handed "Royal Hunt and Tempest" from the pen of Hector Berlioz—a work which bears the subtitle "Descriptive Symphony" and is snatched from the composer's opera, "The Trojans."

The program is brought to a conclusion with Tschaikowsky's graceful "Theme with Variations from Suite Number 3."

Mr. Fiedler, who resumes his duties on Monday night, seems inspired by so lofty a program, and follows it up with a Russian bill, which includes stunning compositions by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, Stravinsky, Tschaikowsky and Glazounov.

On Wednesday, he presents an interesting novelty in the shape of "Facades," a setting of some curious Edith Sitwell poems by William Walton. The same evening the brilliant Sanroma appears as soloist in Weber's romantic "Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra."

The Pops season ends on July th. Tonight is the final Sunday evening program.

230

Music and Musi

Walton, Weber From Travesty On to Romance

The Modernist "Facade" and The Old "Concert-Piece", Alive at The Pops

THE young modernists may sin against ancient lights; but they have desirably taught us not to take music solemnly. (To take it seriously is another matter.) The notion that, say, a symphony concert must be solemn rite is inheritance from the outworn day in which a German atmosphere was the criterion of Anglo-American music-making. As plausibly stress opera as "educational"—the "uplifters' word—while Mr. Gallo of the San Carlo Company blessed them from the box-office. The concert-hall and the opera house are both seats of pleasure. We who frequent them may receive that pleasure from Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" or Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," from Strauss's "Heldenleben" or Debussy's "Faun." Fortunately, there are also lighter moods, bearing no possible relation to the cosmos, the soul of man, aspiration or inspiration.

Euterpe is not less a Muse when she prattles entertainingly and tucks up her skirt for sportive exercise. Other things being equal, a piece of music is not less a piece of music, because it happens to be amusing. If it is amiable and fanciful, be it so. If it makes faces and thumbs its nose, be it also so. Whether it half-smiles or grins broadly, all we need ask is that it be artful in its frivolity, alert in its levity. The new generation in Paris, London, New York, even in rebellious Germany, has written such pieces. They have made way into the concert-hall. There they have given pleasure. Even reviewers—those guardians of the temple—have heard them gladly (as Mr. Newman attested in these columns last Saturday), beating with their sticks or umbrellas upon the floor.

The "solemn" tradition persists, not least in this dear land. Symphony concerts must be symphony concerts. Consequently we will not laugh—if we can help it—though Mr. Converse makes merry with the ten-thousandth flivver or Mr. Carpenter invites us to accompany his perambulating infant. Fortunately again, here in Boston. The Pops—under such an open-minded and many-sided a conductor as Mr. Fiedler—give room for these lighter adventures of young men and old. There we may have ringside seats at Saint-Saëns's zo-ological fête; cluster around Mr. Gershwin's piano; or hear Mr. Tansman intoning his Blues. And last evening to these pleasures was added the rich entertainment of William Walton's "Façade."

"Serious" musicians, on both sides of the Atlantic, know and applaud Mr. Walton. They have heard and admired his full-voiced, high-spirited, round and robustious overture, "Portland Point"; noted the finer graining and the continuing high spirits of his "Sinfonia Concertante"; are waiting patiently for Dr. Koussevitzky to produce the Concerto for Viola that he still keeps up his sleeve. Some of us also, especially if we loaf about London in summer, have heard about his earlier and ebullient "Façade." Or, if we stay at home, have read Mr. Newman's humorsome description of piece and occasion, which ought to be included in every handbook, "How to Become a Reviewer." . . . Of course the recorded paraphernalia were lacking at Symphony Hall. No curtain exhibited a wide-mouthed, pink-and-white face or the broad grin. No one shouted Miss Edith Sitwell's poems rhythmically, through a megaphone, though much of Mr. Walton's music was designed to accompany and, may be, point them. In fact, there were no Sitwellian addenda—unless the listener had conned sundry pages in her "Collected Poems" or glanced through Mr. Newman's article. Instead, we heard numbers chosen from the Suite for Orchestra drawn by Mr. Walton from the music of "Façade." We were the gainers, however, by the larger and the more expert orchestra that now played them.

There was, first, a Tango, then a Pasodobilé, being a Spanish march-rhythm discovered and cherished by modernist composers. (Stravinsky uses it in "The Story of the Soldier.") From the Tango the hearer inferred chiefly that Mr. Walton was in full fettle, bubbling with boyish spirits, yet adept as any adult in his writing for orchestra—the quick fancy, the ready hand, the telling stroke. In the pasodobilé he had found and opened his vein. The dignity of the Spanish rhythm became a pseudo-dignity. the pace, the rhythm, the whole unfolding tune, suited the hidalgo who "loved to be by the seaside." Through the measures he minced: "Il Capitaneo, swaggart braggadocio, sword and moustachio." Mr. Walton was writing both an artful music and an amusing parody, each at the top of his bent.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra went on to the "Swiss Yodelling Song." And, what did we hear? First, sinuous suavities that would have turned the premier yodeller green with envy; second, coiling through them, twisted mimicry, mocking thumb at serious nose, of more than one page in that "popular classic," Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Again Mr. Walton both witty and pithy with parody. To profit Herr Doktor Strauss might listen to this yodelling song; then think back, with a rueful smile, to sections of his "Alpine Symphony." . . . Finally "Mr. Wagg's polka," which he danced in a top-hat, while he sang "Tra la!" A very devil of a polka, prancing, cavorting, chortling, generally and particularly along the way—and all the while Mr. Walton handling the orchestra as though it were a many-voiced instrument on which he was playing for his own pleasure, with gusto and a grin. High spirits, keen parody, a musician's fertile skill. Blessings on thee, British boy!

When the mirth and applause had subsided and the cablegram to be sent to Mr. Walton had run through Mr. Fiedler's head, it was the turn of Mr. Sanromá to play the piano-part in Weber's "Concert-Piece." It is a hundred and ten years old, though nobody in presence last evening except the dry-as-dusts, knew or suspected as much. Until Mr. Borovsky resurrected it last April for a Symphony Concert in Cambridge, it had not been played hereabouts in a genera- tion. Then the thought crossed one or two heads that Mr. Sanromá would succeed with it and now he sat "at the piano," waiting his cue. Whether Weber set out to write a displayful piece in the manner of his time and was caught into a romantic vision, which was his habit, or whether the vision came first and virtuosity and brilliance must needs express it, none may say. Not even Weber himself; for probably the two purposes were inextricable as he wrote and played.

There were the romantical, medieval lady who pined for her absent lord gone a-crusading; the visions of death and bane haunting her; the gleam through the forest of the returning knight (march-time); "'tis he" and a pianistic tumult of joy. And there also were the Weberian glow and flourish; in the piano part Weberian rhetoric and bravura each piled upon the other. (Yes; such things were before Liszt had set a note to music-paper.) Mr. Sanromá played it all to the musical life, as though he and Weber were flinging it off in hot improvisation. The ornate measures glittered; the rhetorical measures swelled; the romantic measures were darksome or tender; the whole was held together, shaded, contrasted, and upbuilt, crescendo into climax. In the eighteen-twenties, this "Concert-Stück" passed for an exciting piece. It was so again under Mr. Sanromá's and Mr. Fiedler's hands in 1931. Young modernists have also their throw-backs.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 15 1931

"Pop" Concerts Present Most Diversified Programs of Good Music.

When a body of 80 skilled musicians play some of the so-called lighter forms of music it warms the hearts of the most exacting as well as the least discriminating of listeners. This the "Pop" concerts, now being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston, are doing under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. This is Mr. Fiedler's second season as conductor of the "Pops" and his reputation as a gifted leader has widened considerably.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The 'Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping of corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Fiedler's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, ye prevai

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 15 1931

"Pop" Concerts Present Most Diversified Programs of Good Music.

When a body of 80 skilled musicians play some of the so-called lighter forms of music it warms the hearts of the most exacting as well as the least discriminating of listeners. This the "Pop" concerts, now being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston, are doing under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. This is Mr. Fiedler's second season as conductor of the "Pops" and his reputation as a gifted leader has widened considerably.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The 'Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping of corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Fiedler's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORGANTOWN, W. VA.
POST
MAY 18 1931

Symphony Orchestra Will Give Five Popular Concerts

NEW YORK, May 18.—(AP)—Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain. The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ-WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 7:30 p. m.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church is to present an "Oriental College" program on the CBS network at 2:30 p. m. May 27, the feature to come from the studios of WABC, New York, and WXYZ, Detroit.

The place of the Famous Trials of History on the WEAF circuit has been taken by an orchestra directed by Alfred Wallenstein, with Countess Olga Albani as soloist and with Pierre Key as commentator. Also on June 2 this program will shift from Sunday to Tuesday night.

Kate Smith, crooner, will take Morton Downey's place at 6 p. m. daily on the WABC chain when he joins a new daily program series.

The talk by Senator Clarence Dill of Washington state, originally announced to be carried by WABC and hookup from London on May 24, is to be made May 31 instead.

A change in schedule on the television channel of 147.5 meter has gone into effect, putting W2XCR, New York, on the air from 2 to 4 p. m. and from 5 to 8 p. m.; W2XCD, Passiac, N. J., from 8 to 9:30, and W3XK, Washington, from 9:30 to 11:30. The first two transmit 60 line pictures at 20 per second and W3XK, 45 lines at 15 pictures at present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM McALESTER, OKLA.
NEWS CAPITAL

MAY 18 1931

Boston Symphony Will Offer Five Radio Broadcasts

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Central Standard throughout)

NEW YORK (AP)—Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The program will originate at Boston with WBZ WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOWLING GREEN, KY.
PARK CITY NEWS
MAY 18 1931

(Central Standard Time)

NEW YORK, May 18.—(AP)—Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ-WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

ARDMORE, OKLA.
ADMOREITE

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Central Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, May 18.—(AP)— Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ and WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, GA.
HERALD
MAY 18 1931

NEW YORK. —(AP)— Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ-WBZA as key stations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVE. ITEM
MAY 20 1931

TS
p" ny
g, ny
t-
m d eh e ue

regular Boston Symphony orchestra will form this special

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

SERIES TO BE HEARD OVER N.B.C. NETWORK BEGINNING JUNE 6

There will be no need this Summer for protests from this department at the broadcasters' neglect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Listeners are to hear a series of concerts—five of them, to be exact, and all of them to last one hour.

The concerts are to be an N. B. C. Saturday night attraction, from 8:30 to 9:30, beginning June 6 and ending with a program of musical fireworks on Independence Day. And so expert is this orchestra that the broadcasts are likely to interfere with the patronage of neighborhood movies, to say nothing of neighborhood soda counters.

The broadcasters, strangely, never have appeared overzealous in signing the Boston band, still regarded as the most famous band in the land. One program by the orchestra was given over the networks last fall—a program designed especially for radio. It was one of the best of musical broadcasts, but silence, so far as the parlors were concerned, fell upon subsequent concerts.

The new arrangement should compensate, in part, for the absence of the orchestra from the air channels last winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 22 1931

"Pops" Are Now in Full Swing at Symphony Hall.

It is the Pops only that keep Boston musical in May and June. The Pops, now in full sway at Symphony hall, are doing more than that. They are delighting crowds each night with perfect performances of popular classics and light music such as none but Arthur Fiedler can command. This consists of nearly 90 players. No other city this side of Europe produces this particular blend of delightful music and sociability, as the Pop goers sit around their tables at Symphony hall with refreshments to touch off the evening.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum Concerts, the Esplanade Concerts (which he inaugurated), and his own Sinfonietta. The Pops have perhaps claimed the finest of his abilities.

A different program is offered each night. Next Sunday will be divided between Wagnerian excerpts and notable new music, such as Hansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique"—an outstanding achievement in symphonic jazz; also Chasins' "Parade," and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma as soloist. The Wagnerian selections include the Introduction to Act III from "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll from "Siegfried," Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

follows upon the memorable 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which came to a close last month. The Pops orchestra

---

Here in Boston

Before Sir Hamilton Harty set out for California via New York, he sent a note to Mr. Fiedler full of warm appreciation for the share of the Pop Orchestra in the concert last Sunday. He praised not only the abilities of the men but their good will—"the human side" by which, in the partnership of performance, British conductors set more store than do their brethren from the Continent.

Though Jacques Gordon will be leader

It is likely that Mr. Gershwin's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra will be added to the repertory at the Pops next spring with Mr. Sanromá playing the solo-part. He has long been keen for it.

he confided to them at the Coolidge Festival last autumn in Chicago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 10 1931

"POPS OPEN
IN BOSTON

Boston's annual "Pop" concerts opened for their 46th season in Symphony Hall last week with Arthur Fiedler continuing as conductor of the group of Boston Symphony Orchestra players. The Cecelia Society and Jesus Maria Sanroma, recently soloist with the University Glee Club, will assist tonight at the first Sunday evening program. The program will have a new "Pomp and Circumstance" march by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by William Boyce, 18th century British composer; "Londonderry Air," Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert, and three works by Tschaikowski, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The program announced by Mr. Fiedler last week include not only the lighter numbers from the "classic" composers but some of the operetta music of today such as excerpts from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and Romberg's "Nina Rose" and "New Moon."

230

Music and Musi

Walton, Weber From Travesty On to Romance

The Modernist "Facade" and The Old "Concert-Piece", Alive at The Pops

THE young modernists may sin against ancient lights; but they have desirably taught us not to take music solemnly. (To take it seriously is another matter.) The notion that, say, a symphony concert must be solemn rite is inheritance from the outworn day in which a German atmosphere was the criterion of Anglo-American music-making. As plausibly stress opera as "educational"—the "uplifters' word—while Mr. Gallo of the San Carlo Company blessed them from the box-office. The concert-hall and the opera house are both seats of pleasure. We who frequent them may receive that pleasure from Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" or Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," from Strauss's "Heldenleben" or Debussy's "Faun." Fortunately, there are also lighter moods, bearing no possible relation to the cosmos, the soul of man, aspiration or inspiration.

Euterpe is not less a Muse when she prattles entertainingly and tucks up her skirt for sportive exercise. Other things being equal, a piece of music is not less a piece of music, because it happens to be amusing. If it is amiable and fanciful, be it so. If it makes faces and thumbs its nose, be it also so. Whether it half-smiles or grins broadly, all we need ask is that it be artful in its frivolity, alert in its levity. The new generation in Paris, London, New York, even in rebellious Germany, has written such pieces. They have made way into the concert-hall. There they have given pleasure. Even reviewers—those guardians of the temple—have heard them gladly (as Mr. Newman attested in these columns last Saturday), beating with their sticks or umbrellas upon the floor.

The "solemn" tradition persists, not least in this dear land. Symphony concerts must be symphony concerts. Consequently we will not laugh—if we can help it—though Mr. Converse makes merry with the ten-thousandth flivver or Mr. Carpenter invites us to accompany his perambulating infant. Fortunately again, here in Boston. The Pops—under such an open-minded and many-sided a conductor as Mr. Fiedler—give room for these lighter adventures of young men and old. There we may have ringside seats at Saint-Saëns's zo-ological fête; cluster around Mr. Gershwin's piano; or hear Mr. Tansman intoning his Blues. And last evening to these pleasures was added the rich entertainment of William Walton's "Façade."

"Serious" musicians, on both sides of the Atlantic, know and applaud Mr. Walton. They have heard and admired his full-voiced, high-spirited, round and robustious overture, "Portland Point"; noted the finer graining and the continuing high spirits of his "Sinfonia Concertante"; are waiting patiently for Dr. Koussevitzky to produce the Concerto for Viola that he still keeps up his sleeve. Some of us also, especially if we loaf about London in summer, have heard about his earlier and ebullient "Façade." Or, if we stay at home, have read Mr. Newman's humorsome description of piece and occasion, which ought to be included in every handbook, "How to Become a Reviewer." . . . Of course the recorded paraphernalia were lacking at Symphony Hall. No curtain exhibited a wide-mouthed, pink-and-white face or the broad grin. No one shouted Miss Edith Sitwell's poems rhythmically through a megaphone, though much of Mr. Walton's music was designed to accompany and, may be, point them. In fact, there were no Sitwellian addenda—unless the listener had conned sundry pages in her "Collected Poems" or glanced through Mr. Newman's article. Instead, we heard numbers chosen from the Suite for Orchestra drawn by Mr. Walton from the music of "Façade." We were the gainers, however, by the larger and the more expert orchestra that now played them.

There was, first, a Tango, then a Pasodobilé, being a Spanish march-rhythm discovered and cherished by modernist composers. (Stravinsky uses it in "The Story of the Soldier.") From the Tango the hearer inferred chiefly that Mr. Walton was in full fettle, bubbling with boyish spirits, yet adept as any adult in his writing for orchestra—the quick fancy, the ready hand, the telling stroke. In the pasodobilé he had found and opened his vein. The dignity of the Spanish rhythm became a pseudo-dignity, the pace, the rhythm, the whole unfolding tune, suited the hidalgo who "loved to be by the seaside." Through the measures he minced: "Il Capitaneo, swaggart braggadocio, sword and moustachio." Mr. Walton was writing both an artful music and an amusing parody, each at the top of his bent.

Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra went on to the "Swiss Yodelling Song." And, what did we hear? First, sinuous suavities that would have turned the premier yodeller green with envy; second, coiling through them, twisted mimicry, mocking thumb at serious nose, of more than one page in that "popular classic," Rossini's overture to "William Tell." Again Mr. Walton both witty and pithy with parody. To profit Herr Doktor Strauss might listen to this yodelling song; then think back, with a rueful smile, to sections of his "Alpine Symphony." . . . Finally "Mr. Wagg's polka," which he danced in a top-hat, while he sang "Tra la!" A very devil of a polka, prancing, cavorting, chortling, generally and particularly along the way—and all the while Mr. Walton handling the orchestra as though it were a many-voiced instrument on which he was playing for his own pleasure, with gusto and a grin. High spirits, keen parody, a musician's fertile skill. Blessings on thee, British boy!

When the mirth and applause had subsided and the cablegram to be sent to Mr. Walton had run through Mr. Fiedler's head, it was the turn of Mr. Sanromá to play the piano-part in Weber's "Concert-Piece." It is a hundred and ten years old, though nobody in presence last evening except the dry-as-dusts, knew or suspected as much. Until Mr. Borovsky resurrected it last April for a Symphony Concert in Cambridge, it had not been played hereabouts in a genera- tion. Then the thought crossed one or two heads that Mr. Sanromá would succeed with it and now he sat "at the piano," waiting his cue. Whether Weber set out to write a displayful piece in the manner of his time and was caught into a romantic vision, which was his habit, or whether the vision came first and virtuosity and brilliance must needs express it, none may say. Not even Weber himself; for probably the two purposes were inextricable as he wrote and played.

There were the romantical, medieval lady who pined for her absent lord gone a-crusading; the visions of death and bane haunting her; the gleam through the forest of the returning knight (march-time): "'tis he" and a pianist's tumult of joy. And there also were the Weberian glow and flourish; in the piano part Weberian rhetoric and bravura each piled upon the other. (Yes; such things were before Liszt had set a note to music-paper.) Mr. Sanromá played it all to the musical life, as though he and Weber were flinging it off in hot improvisation. The ornate measures glittered; the rhetorical measures swelled; the romantic measures were darksome or tender; the whole was held together, shaded, contrasted, and upbuilt, crescendo into climax. In the eighteen-twenties, this "Concert-Stück" passed for an exciting piece. It was so again under Mr. Sanromá's and Mr. Fiedler's hands in 1931. Young modernists have also their throw-backs.

H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 15 1931

"Pop" Concerts Present Most Diversified Programs of Good Music.

When a body of 80 skilled musicians play some of the so-called lighter forms of music it warms the hearts of the most exacting as well as the least discriminating of listeners. This the "Pop" concerts, now being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston, are doing under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. This is Mr. Fiedler's second season as conductor of the "Pops" and his reputation as a gifted leader has widened considerably.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The 'Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping of corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Fiedler's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORGANTOWN, W. VA.
POST.
MAY 18 1931

unable to match the speed of two "Expressmen," who, by way, were the only finalists to the route without touching wo Callaway and Floyd also took fi and second in the low hurdles.

Morgantown Sixth

It probably will be well to ta time out here to mention th Charleston high finished third team scoring with 21 points. C Hill high, 1930 champions, was poor fourth with 16½ points. Gr ton high, led by Mr. Henry Ru the high point trophy winner, fifth with 15 points—Rupp get 14 of them on firsts in the shot a discus and a second in the ha work at 2:30 p. m. May 2 feature to come from the studios of WABC, New York, and WXYZ, Detroit.

The place of the Famous Trials of History on the WEAF circuit has been taken by an orchestra directed by Alfred Wallenstein, with Countess Olga Albani as soloist and with Pierre Key as commentator. Also on June 2 this program will shift from Sunday to Tuesday night.

Kate Smith, crooner, will take Morton Downey's place at 6 p. m. daily on the WABC chain when he joins a new daily program series.

The talk by Senator Clarence Dill of Washington state, originally announced to be carried by WABC and hookup from London on May 24, is to be made May 31 instead.

A change in schedule on the television channel of 147.5 meter has gone into effect, putting W2XCR, New York, on the air from 2 to 4 p. m. and from 5 to 8 p. m.; W2XCD, Passiac, N. J., from 8 to 9:30, and W3XK, Washington, from 9:30 to 11:30. The first two transmit 60 line pictures at 20 per second and W3XK, 45 lines at 15 pictures at present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM McALESTER, OKLA.
NEWS CAPITAL

MAY 2 1931

Boston Symphony Will Offer Five Radio Broadcasts

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Central Standard throughout)

NEW YORK (AP)—Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOWLING GREEN, KY.
PARK CITY NEWS
MAY 18 1931

(Central Standard Time)

NEW YORK, May 18.—(AP)—Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ-WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

ARDMORE, OKLA.
ADMOREITE

MAY 1 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Central Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, May 18.—(AP)— Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ and WBZA as key stations. The conductor will be Arthur Fiedler, each concert to last an hour, opening at 6:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUGUSTA, GA.
HERALD
MAY 18 1931

NEW YORK, —(AP)— Five popular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be broadcast from June 6 to July 4 by the WJZ chain.

The programs will originate at Boston with WBZ-WBZA as key stations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
EVE. ITEM
MAY 19 1931

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN WEEKLY BROADCASTS

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, over an NBC-WJZ network during June and July.

These concerts will be heard on Saturday nights, between 8.30 and 9.30 PM, Eastern Daylight Time, beginning June 6 and concluding with a patriotic program on Independence Day. Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra will form this special

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

SERIES TO BE HEARD OVER N.B.C. NETWORK BEGINNING JUNE 6

There will be no need this Summer for protests from this department at the broadcasters' neglect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Listeners are to hear a series of concerts—five of them, to be exact, and all of them to last one hour.

The concerts are to be an N. B. C. Saturday night attraction, from 8:30 to 9:30, beginning June 6 and ending with a program of musical fireworks on Independence Day. And so expert is this orchestra that the broadcasts are likely to interfere with the patronage of neighborhood movies, to say nothing of neighborhood soda counters.

The broadcasters, strangely, never have appeared overzealous in signing the Boston band, still regarded as the most famous band in the land. One program by the orchestra was given over the networks last fall—a program designed especially for radio. It was one of the best of musical broadcasts, but silence, so far as the parlors were concerned, fell upon subsequent concerts.

The new arrangement should compensate, in part, for the absence of the orchestra from the air channels last winter.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 22 1931

"Pops" Are Now in Full Swing at Symphony Hall.

It is the Pops only that keep Boston musical in May and June. The Pops, now in full sway at Symphony hall, are doing more than that. They are delighting crowds each night with perfect performances of popular classics and light music such as none but Arthur Fiedler can command. This consists of nearly 90 players. No other city this side of Europe produces this particular blend of delightful music and sociability, as the Pop goers sit around their tables at Sym is the 46th season of the Pops, and follows upon the memorable 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which came to a close last month. The Pops orchestra phony hall with refreshments to touch off the evening.

Arthur Fiedler, a native of Boston and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, the former violinist of this orchestra, has in recent years made a distinct name for himself by his rising talents as conductor. He is known as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, the Museum Concerts, the Esplanade Concerts (which he inaugurated), and his own Sinfonietta. The Pops have perhaps claimed the finest of his abilities.

A different program is offered each night. Next Sunday will be divided between Wagnerian excerpts and notable new music, such as Hansman's "Sonatine Transatlantique"—an outstanding achievement in symphonic jazz; also Chasins' "Parade," and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Sanroma as soloist. The Wagnerian selections include the Introduction to Act III from "Lohengrin," Siegfried Idyll from "Siegfried," Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

Here in Boston

Before Sir Hamilton Harty set out for California via New York, he sent a note to Mr. Fiedler full of warm appreciation for the share of the Pop Orchestra in the concert last Sunday. He praised only the abilities of the men but good will—"the human side" by M. in the partnership of performance ish conductors set more store their brethren from the Continen

Though Jacques Gordon will

It is likely that Mr. Gershwi certo for Piano and Orchestra added to the repertory at the P spring with Mr. Sanromá playing part. He has long been keen fo he confided to them at my lodgings tival last autumn in Chicago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 10 1931

"POPS OPEN IN BOSTON

Boston's annual "Pop" concerts opened for their 46th season in Symphony Hall last week with Arthur Fiedler continuing as conductor of the group of Boston Symphony Orchestra players. The Cecelia Society and Jesus Maria Sanroma, recently soloist with the University Glee Club, will assist tonight at the first Sunday evening program. The program will have a new "Pomp and Circumstance" march by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by William Boyce, 18th century British composer; "Londonderry Air," Harty; "The Rio Grande," Lambert, and three works by Tschaikowski, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet, the "Nutcracker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The program announced by Mr. Fiedler last week include not only the lighter numbers from the "classic" composers but some of the operetta music of today such as excerpts from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and Romberg's "Nina Rose" and "New Moon."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAY 15 1931

"Pop" Concerts Present Most Diversified Programs of Good Music.

When a body of 80 skilled musicians play some of the so-called lighter forms of music it warms the hearts of the most exacting as well as the least discriminating of listeners. This the "Pop" concerts, now being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston, are doing under the leadership of Arthur Fiedler. This is Mr. Fiedler's second season as conductor of the "Pops" and his reputation as a gifted leader has widened considerably.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the Bilse concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The 'Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping of corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Fiedler's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
MAY 22 1931

POP CONCERTS TO BE BROADCAST

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard During June and July

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, over an NBC-WJZ network during June and July. These concerts will be heard on Saturday nights, between 8:30 and 9:30 o'clock, eastern daylight time, beginning June 6 and concluding with a patriotic program on Independence Day. Through the cooperation of station WBZ, Boston, the concerts will be picked up from the stage of Symphony hall, with Arthur E. Eddes, of WEEI, announcing.

Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra will form this special musical group whose nightly "Pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season with a nationwide reputation equal to that of the New York stadium concerts the St Louis open air opera programs or the Hollywood bowl concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR
MAY 24 1931

Present "Pop" Concerts.

A series of five one-hour "pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, over WJZ's network from June 6 to July 4, it has been announced. The concerts will be heard on Saturday evenings between 6:30 and 7:30 o'clock, central standard time. Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony will form this special musical group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS
MAY 25 1931

Radio Finds More Time For Boston Symphony

Not long ago we protested again, and again comes word that N. B. C. is to give a highter tone to its music menus in June by broadcasting a series of "pop" concerts from Boston.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAY 31 1931

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and director of the Saturday concert, June 6, over WJZ at 8:30 P.M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAY 31 1931

OTHERS GALS!
Raoul WOMEN
NAT
VICTOR MACLAG
GRETA NISS
plus 5 Ac
FOX
BIJOU
A finish fight between gangland and the law. The real inside story of racketeering.
"The LAWLESS WOMAN"
with Vera Reynolds-Carroll Nye-Thomas Jackson-Gwen Lee Added Featurettes—Charlie
Pathe Ne
Coming Thursday "THE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Saturday, June 6.

Details of the Suburban Handicap at Belmont Park, the first race of the metropolitan season to be broadcast, will be carried to WJZ's audience Saturday. Among the horses that will line up at the post at 4:10 P. M. will be Questionnaire, Sun Beau and Gallant Knight.

Jim Londos, world's heavyweight wrestling champion, will be interviewed in a sound-and-sight program to be transmitted by WGBS, synchronized with W2XCR, Saturday at 7:45 P. M.

The Manhattan Male Chorus, directed by André Kostelanetz, will be heard through WABC's system at 8:30 Saturday night, singing:

Border Ballad ..... Maunder
The Beetle and the Flower ..... Veit
Song of the Volga Boatmen ..... Arr. Kostelanetz
John Peel ..... Andrews
Evening Moods ..... Baldwin
Swing Along ..... Cook

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard over WJZ's network Saturday at 8:30 P. M.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1931

'Pop' Concerts Resume On WJZ This Month

Five Programs by Boston Symphony Are Scheduled

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston, over station WJZ during June and July.

These concerts will be heard on Saturday night between 8:30 and 9:30 p. m. The first program will be broadcast June 6, and the series will conclude on Independence Day.

Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra will form this special musical group whose nightly "pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season. The program will be picked up through station WBZ, whence they will be distributed throughout the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1931

Arthur Fielder, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in weekly broadcasts, which will begin Saturday at 8:30 over WJZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAVENPORT, IA.
D DEMOCRAT LEADER
JUN 1 1931

TO INAUGURATE NEW SERIES OF "POP" CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Opening Program Over NBC.

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company will be heard over an NBC—WJZ network Saturday from 6:30 to 7:30 p. m., central standard time.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

On NBC Network.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nationwide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be thru station WBZ in Boston.

Both "Tech" and Harvard, as well as other educational institutions in Boston, have celebrated their graduations in this manner since the earliest days of the "pop" concerts, but the broadcast of Saturday by NBC will mark the first time the radio audience will have been privileged to hear any of these programs.

In 46th Season.

Inauguration of the Boston "pop" concert series by NBC follows closely upon the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The "pop" concerts heard in Boston are in their 46th season, and, dating back to Boston's early musical annals, rank with the city's most time-honored and prized institutions.

NBC in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

Originally known as the Promenade concerts, the series speedily became known by the vernacular "pop." The name was adopted in semi-official fashion, and in the end completely replaced any other title.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES
SAN MATEO, CALIF.
JUN 2 - 1931

Pop Concerts on Air From Boston

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences will be heard over an NBC network Saturday, June 6, from 4:30 to 5 p. m., Pacific time. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Both "Tech" and Harvard, as well as other educational institutions in Boston, have celebrated their graduations in this manner since the earliest days of the "pop" concerts, but the broadcast June 6 by NBC will mark the first time the radio audience will have been privileged to hear any of these programs.

Following is the program:
Prelude, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Scherzo, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Western stations releasing the series include KGO.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OAKLAND, CAL.
POST ENQUIRER
JUN 5 - 1931

BOSTON 'POP' FOR DIALERS TOMORROW

By J. E. Doyle

The Boston symphony orchestra "pop" concert will be heard over KGO tomorrow afternoon from 4:30 to 5 o'clock.

The concert will inaugurate the forty-sixth season of the so-called "pop" series by the 50-year-old organization and will also mark technology night at Symphony hall, with a large representation of M. I. T. men in the audience.

Arthur Fiedler, first Boston boy to lead the 93-piece orchestra, will conduct. He is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, violinist with the Boston symphony for a quarter of a century and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

Time and legislation have sort of upset the original "pop" idea with the tables on the floor in place of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
BLADE
JUN 5

POP CONCERT SATURDAY NIGHT

Members of the Boston Symphony to Begin Series.

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting Co. will be heard over an NBC-WJZ network Saturday, June 6, from 7:30 to 8:30 P. M.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pick-up and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
231
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" CONCERTS ON WLW PROGRAM

Weekly Symphony Series To Start Over Blue Network Tonight.

ARTHUR FIELDER TO LEAD

Duchess of Atholl to Speak On Five-Year Plan From London Sunday.

By RADIO FORECASTER.

Beginning tonight, radio fans in this territory will be privileged to listen in to the Boston Symphony series of "pop" concerts.

Duchess of Atholl.

WLW will bring these concerts every Saturday night direct from Symphony Hall. This is the 46th series of "pop" concerts. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The "pop" concerts date back to the time when formal rows of chairs were removed from Symphony Hall during the warm season and tables were installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer, munch sandwiches and smoke during Strauss waltzes or Sousa marches.

Tonight's program: Prelude to "Carmen" by Bizet; overture to "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn; prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Saens; violin solo by Tulius Theodorowicz; "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, and "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," by Ponchielli.

The first of three addresses from London on Russia's Five Year Plan will be broadcast by the Columbia System with WAIU at 11:30 a. m. Sunday. Sunday's speaker will be the Duchess of Atholl. She will present the viewpoint of capitalist industry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
NEWS BEE

PAGE 5

BOSTON MUSIC ON NBC ETHER SATURDAY EVE

Will Direct

Arthur Fiedler

Arthur Fiedler will conduct the series of pop concerts given by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the blue NBC chain Saturday night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
MAY 22 1931

POP CONCERTS TO BE BROADCAST

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard During June and July

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, over an NBC-WJZ network during June and July. These concerts will be heard on Saturday nights, between 8:30 and 9:30 o'clock, eastern daylight time, beginning June 6 and concluding with a patriotic program on Independence Day. Through the cooperation of station WBZ, Boston, the concerts will be picked up from the stage of Symphony hall, with Arthur E. Eddes, of WEEI, announcing.

Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra will form this special musical group whose nightly "Pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season with a nationwide reputation equal to that of the New York stadium concerts the St Louis open air opera programs or the Hollywood bowl concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

Present "Pop" Concerts.

A series of five one-hour "pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, over WJZ's network from June 6 to July 4, it has been announced. The concerts will be heard on Saturday evenings between 6:30 and 7:30 o'clock, central standard time. Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony will form this special musical group.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS
MAY 25

Radio Finds More Time For Boston Symphony

Not long ago we protested again, and again comes word that N. B. C. is to give a highter tone to its music menus in June by broadcasting a series of "pop" concerts from Boston.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and director of the Saturday concert, June 6, over WJZ at 8:30 P.M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

"POP" CONCERT TO MARK TECH NIGHT

Listeners Privileged to Hear Annual Festival of M. I. T. On Saturday Night

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company, will be heard over an NBC-WJZ network Saturday, June 6, from 8.30 to 9.30 p. m.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berlisz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

First Time on the Air

Both "Tech" and Harvard, as well as other educational institutions in Boston, have celebrated their graduations in this manner since the earliest days of the "pop" concerts, but the coming broadcast will mark the first time the radio audience will have been privileged to hear any of these programs.

NBC, in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

Saturday, June 6.

Details of the Suburban Handicap at Belmont Park, the first race of the metropolitan season to be broadcast, will be carried to WJZ's audience Saturday. Among the horses that will line up at the post at 4:10

P. M. will be Questionnaire, Sun Beau and Gallant Knight.

Jim Londos, world's heavyweight wrestling champion, will be interviewed in a sound-and-sight program to be transmitted by WGBS, synchronized with W2XCR, Saturday at 7:45 P. M.

The Manhattan Male Chorus, directed by André Kostelanetz, will be heard through WABC's system at 8:30 Saturday night, singing:

Border Ballad ..... Maunder
The Beetle and the Flower ..... Veit
Song of the Volga Boatmen ..... Arr. Kostelanetz
John Peel ..... Andrews
Evening Moods ..... Baldwin
Swing Along ..... Cook

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard over WJZ's network Saturday at 8:30 P. M.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler. The program follows:

Prelude to "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "The Roman Carnival" ... Berlioz
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Prelude to "The Deluge" ..... Saint-Saens
Violin solo, Tulius Theodorowicz.
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli

Boston Symphony ... this special musical group whose nightly "pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season. The program will be picked up through station WBZ, whence they will be distributed throughout the country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAY 31 1931

Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet. Arthur Fiedler, born in Boston in 1894, attended the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, studied conducting, piano and violin, and in 1915 joined the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A virtuoso of the piano, violin, viola, and in the field of conducting, he is widely conversant with classical music, the better sort of popular melodies, and with the more agreeable "moderns." He is, therefore, in a position to offer NBC audiences each Saturday night a widely diversified "pop" program. Critics have lauded him as possessing great power and promise in his field.

Ninety-three Musicians

Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 93 in all, who have been selected to play during the NBC radio presentations each week, are masters of their respective instruments. Though selected from the parent orchestral organization only, they will not be heard on the air as the Boston Symphony.

Historical scanning of the Boston "pop" concerts reveals a pleasantly quaint tradition that harks back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was but four years old. A supplementary series of concerts, of popular character, was started to suit the warm season.

The series was modeled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer, munch sandwiches and smoke during Strauss waltzes or Sousa marches. The experiment "caught on," and became an annual and highly successful institution.

Originally known as the Promenade concerts, the series speedily became known by the vernacular "pop." The name was adopted in semi-official fashion, and in the end completely replaced any other title.

NEW SERIES OF "POP" CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Opening Program Over NBC.

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company will be heard over an NBC—WJZ network Saturday from 6:30 to 7:30 p. m., central standard time.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

On NBC Network.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nationwide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be thru station WBZ in Boston.

Both "Tech" and Harvard, as well as other educational institutions in Boston, have celebrated their graduations in this manner since the earliest days of the "pop" concerts, but the broadcast of Saturday by NBC will mark the first time the radio audience will have been privileged to hear any of these programs.

In 46th Season.

Inauguration of the Boston "pop" concert series by NBC follows closely upon the 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The "pop" concerts heard in Boston are in their 46th season, and, dating back to Boston's early musical annals, rank with the city's most time-honored and prized institutions.

NBC in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

Originally known as the Promenade concerts, the series speedily became known by the vernacular "pop." The name was adopted in semi-official fashion, and in the end completely replaced any other title.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES
SAN MATEO, CALIF.
JUN 2 - 1931

Pop Concerts on Air From Boston

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences will be heard over an NBC network Saturday, June 6, from 4:30 to 5 p. m., Pacific time. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Both "Tech" and Harvard, as well as other educational institutions in Boston, have celebrated their graduations in this manner since the earliest days of the "pop" concerts, but the broadcast June 6 by NBC will mark the first time the radio audience will have been privileged to hear any of these programs.

Following is the program:
Prelude, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" ..... Berlioz
Scherzo, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Western stations releasing the series include KGO.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OAKLAND, CAL.
POST ENQUIRER
JUN 5 - 1931

BOSTON 'POP' FOR DIALERS TOMORROW

By J. E. Doyle

The Boston symphony orchestra "pop" concert will be heard over KGO tomorrow afternoon from 4:30 to 5 o'clock.

The concert will inaugurate the forty-sixth season of the so-called "pop" series by the 50-year-old organization and will also mark technology night at Symphony hall, with a large representation of M. I. T. men in the audience.

Arthur Fiedler, first Boston boy to lead the 93-piece orchestra, will conduct. He is the son of Emmanuel Fiedler, violinist with the Boston symphony for a quarter of a century and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet.

Time and legislation have sort of upset the original "pop" idea with the tables on the floor in place of the usual rows of seats, and concert lovers munching sandwiches, drinking light wines and beers and smoking while listening to the orchestra. It is difficult to imagine a "pop" from hip flasks, but the name has been retained through the years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" CONCERTS ON WLW PROGRAM

Weekly Symphony Series To Start Over Blue Network Tonight.

ARTHUR FIELDER TO LEAD

Duchess of Atholl to Speak On Five-Year Plan From London Sunday.

By RADIO FORECASTER.

Beginning tonight, radio fans in this territory will be privileged to listen in to the Boston Symphony series of "pop" concerts.

Duchess of Atholl.

WLW will bring these concerts every Saturday night direct from Symphony Hall. This is the 46th series of "pop" concerts. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

The "pop" concerts date back to the time when formal rows of chairs were removed from Symphony Hall during the warm season and tables were installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer, munch sandwiches and smoke during Strauss waltzes or Sousa marches.

Tonight's program: Prelude to "Carmen" by Bizet; overture to "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn; prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Saens; violin solo by Tulius Theodorowicz; "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, and "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," by Ponchielli.

The first of three addresses from London on Russia's Five Year Plan will be broadcast by the Columbia System with WAIU at 11:30 a. m. Sunday. Sunday's speaker will be the Duchess of Atholl. She will present the viewpoint of capitalist industry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, O.
NEWS BEE

PAGE 5

BOSTON MUSIC ON NBC ETHER SATURDAY EVE

Dentist Talks, CBS, in Week-End of Varied Amusements

By DONALD POND,
Sitting In For Joe Collier.

The famous "pop" concerts by members of the equally famous Boston Symphony orchestra will come to the air from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m. Saturday for the first time. This is an unsponsored series, evidently one of NBC's wholly praiseworthy gestures in the way of presenting real music to the customers.

The night's program will mark the beginning of the 50th session of the "pop" concerts, to which anybody who is anybody in Boston goes at least once during the summer season. It will also mark "pop" concert night for the graduating class of M. I. T., which along with the outgoing class at Harvard makes pilgrimages each year to Symphony hall during graduation week.

When "Pop" Was Pop.

If you're wondering about the "pop" —they used to be called promenade concerts many, many years ago—let me remind you of the halcyon days before prohibition became a law and tell you that originally these were most informal musical events.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUN 6 - 1931

RADIO NEWS

BOSTON "POP" SERIES OPENS

WBZ Acts as Key Station for First Concert by Symphony

Springfield, June 6—(AP)—The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company, will be heard over WBZ tonight from 8.30 to 9.30.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berlitz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

NBC, in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience for conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet. Arthur Fiedler, born in Boston in 1894, attended Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, studied conducting, piano and violin, and in 1915 joined the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The radio audience tonight will hear the following carefully selected program:—

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Prelude to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
Violin solo, Tulius Theodorowicz
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saens
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
JUN 1931

FIVE 'POP' CONCERTS ON SATURDAY NIGHTS FORM BOSTON BILL

The broadcasters have frequently offered concerts by the most famous orchestras in the country and have signed some of them for regular series over the networks.

They have even arranged for broadcasts to America by some of the best musical organizations in Europe. But somehow they have neglected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generally regarded as the most outstanding group in the country.

One program was given over the radio by the Boston orchestra last fall—a program especially designed for radio. It was one of the best of musical broadcasts but for some reason the orchestra did not come back to the air.

At last the radio's list of famous musical groups will be complete. Beginning tonight the Boston orchestra will give a series of five "pop" concerts. They will be heard every Saturday night for the next month.

The concerts will be designed to divert the perspiring parlors. There will be no tendency to heavy classics. Since the inauguration of the "pop" concert series by the Cleveland Orchestra a few weeks ago the broadcasters have arranged for more [illegible] this type.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" SERIES OPENS

WBZ Acts As Key Station For First — Arthur iFedler in Charge—On the Air at 8.30

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company, will be heard over WBZ tonight from 8.30 to 9.30 p. m.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The sries, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berlitz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

NBC, in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet. Arthur Fiedler, born in Boston in 1894, attended the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, studied conducting, piano and violin, and in 1915 joined the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Notable figures in the world of music have conducted the "pop" concerts, including Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski, Andre Maquarre and Gustave Strube. Later a more definite stress was laid on the musical side. Alfredo Casella, distinguished Italian composer-conductor-pianist, and, today, Arthur Fiedler, have brought fine compositions from the facile pens of brilliant masters to the "pop" audiences." This same practice will continue to hold true during the NBC presentations from Symphony hall during the NBC presentations from Symphony hall during the summer series this year.

The radio audience tonight will hear the following carefully selected program:—

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Prelude to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
Violin solo, Tulius Theodorowicz
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saens
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"	Ponchiel

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
JUN 6 - 193[illegible]

On WJR

ARTHUR FIEDLER
This orchestra director will conduct the concert by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over WJR at 7:30 p. m. today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" CONCERTS ON WLW PROGRAM

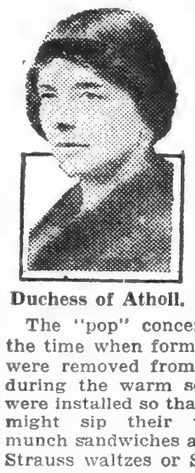
Weekly Symphony Series To Start Over Blue Network Tonight.

ARTHUR FIELDER TO LEAD

Duchess of Atholl to Speak On Five-Year Plan From London Sunday.

By RADIO FORECASTER.

Beginning tonight, radio fans in this territory will be privileged to listen in to the Boston Symphony series of "pop" concerts. WLW will bring these concerts every Saturday night direct from Symphony Hall. This is the 46th series of "pop" concerts. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.



Duchess of Atholl.

The "pop" concerts date back to the time when formal rows of chairs were removed from Symphony Hall during the warm season and tables were installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer, munch sandwiches and smoke during Strauss waltzes or Sousa marches.

Tonight's program: Prelude to "Carmen" by Bizet; overture to "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn; prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Saens; violin solo by Tulius Theodorowicz; "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, and "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," by Ponchielli.

[illegible] from

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON OFFERS ITS SYMPHONY

Popular Concert to Be Played Tonight—Notes of Other Features.

Interesting to the habitual Saturday listener is the announcement of the first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Trained to be one of the best musical organizations of its kind, this group comes to radio under the baton of Arthur Fielder. Just a bit of biography about Mr. Fielder reveals his birthdate to be 1894. He attended the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin where he studied conducting, piano and violin. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

Tonight's program, beginning at 7:30 o'clock, will not only [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
JUN 6 - 1931

* * *

ANOTHER PROGRAM SERIES to be thankful for is the Boston Symphony Orchestra "pop" concerts beginning tonight over NBC and WLS. NBC is doing a bit better by the Boston Symphony than during last year's season when, after many requests by radio critics and listneners, but one concert was given a network.

Five weekly programs will be broadcast by the famous instrumental unit, made up of 93 musicians, which is now in its 46th season, and I'm sure you'll be grateful to NBC and the Boston Symphony after you've given your dial a twist to the first concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL
JUN 6 1931

By DOROTHY DORAN
Beacon Journal Radio Editor

BOSTON'S time-honored music institution known as "Pop" concerts, inaugurates a series on the air tonight when the 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra offer a program over NBC-WJZ network between 7:30 and 8:30 o'clock. This program is hailed by music lovers as an extravagant radio event.

Tonight's concert not only opens the series, but also marks the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Arthur Fielder, who comes from an old Boston family with considerable musical background, conducts the orchestra.

It is interesting to note that these concerts originated as Promenade concerts, later coming to be known as "Pop" concerts. This type of music presentation has been popular in Boston for almost 50 years.

This inaugural concert will bring music of Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli. The latter will be represented in the Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda." Dial WLW for the relay.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL
JUN 6 1931

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, masters of their respective instrumen[illegible]s will be heard over an NBC-WJZ network, tonight, from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., Annapolis time. The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It will incorporate composition by Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Pinchielli.

Inauguration of the Boston "pop" concert series by NBC follows closely upon the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Historical scanning revels a pleasantly quaint tradition that harks back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was but four years old. A supplementary series of concerts of popular character was started to suit the warm season. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer. Originally known as the Promenade Concerts, the series speedily became known by the vernacular "pop."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JUN 6 - 1931

GibbonesqueTalk On Dirigibles Scheduled

By BURGESS E. SMITH

Perhaps as a sop to few good symphonic programs during the summer, which this department has been bewailing, with others, the program makers have corralled the Boston Symphony for a season of "pop" concerts, the first at 7:30 tonight on the WHAM-NBC network. And lest you lovers of popular music view with alarm, you are promised music suitable for every taste; but we suspect, and hope, no such tunes as "Star Dust" or "Moonlight Saving Time" will be included, although we wouldn't object to "When Yuba Plays the Rhumba On the Tuba."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

Boston Symphony on WLS.

The first of a series of five one-hour pop concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, will be broadcast by WLS and the NBC tonight at 7:30 direct from Symphony hall in Boston. The first program this evening marks Tech night, annual graduation feature at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The ninety-three picked musicians tonight do numbers of Bizet, Mendelssohn and Saint Saens.

ARTHUR FIEDLER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS
JUN 6 193[illegible]

Boston -- Willie Stribling -- Brevities -- V. R. Jacobs--Baseball--Cleveland-- Other Bits

By RAY D. O'TIP

NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO. offers you musical relief from the blare of Saturday dance, relaying the first of a series of "pop" concerts by the 93-piece Boston symphony.

* * *

"POP in Boston, however, doesn't mean "Wabash Moon" or "Peanut Vendor." Rather it refers to the prelude to "Carmen," overture to "Roman Carnival" and Dance of the Hours from "La Giaconda."

* * *

THE "Pop" concerts, incidentally, are an annual affair dating back to 1885 when one of the earlier Boston Symphonies played warm weather music in a quasi-beer garden where sandwiches were munched, cigars smoked and light liquors consumed in moderate quantities. Originally they were known as the Promenade Concerts but this speedily became shortened to the colloquial "Pop." If your're interested, and I think you should be, tune WLW at 7:30.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DECATUR, ILL.
REVIEW

Boston Symphony Series On Chain

"The Devil" on Saturday Night's Drama Bill.

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston [illegible] orchestra, conducted [illegible] Feidler, will begin Saturday ni[illegible] 6:30 p. m. through WLS, WJ[illegible] WSM. Ninety-three members [illegible] the regular Boston Symphony o[illegible]chestra will form this special musical group whose nightly "Pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season with a nationwide reputation equal to that of the New York Sta[illegible]um concerts, the St. Louis open [illegible]nera programs and the Holly[illegible]d concerts.

[illegible]act drama, "The Poo[illegible] "Fortune Smi[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK NEWS
JUN 7 - 1931

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra was featured in a Pop concert. This sample of what we are to expect during this new series offers much to look forward to, and time will fly as it did when they played the "Dance of the Hours" (WJZ—8:30 P. M.).

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
JUN 6 - 1931

RADIO NEWS

BOSTON "POP" SERIES OPENS

WBZ Acts as Key Station for First Concert by Symphony

Springfield, June 6—(AP)—The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company, will be heard over WBZ tonight from 8.30 to 9.30.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berlitz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

NBC, in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience for conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet. Arthur Fiedler, born in Boston in 1894, attended Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, studied conducting, piano and violin, and in 1915 joined the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The radio audience tonight will hear the following carefully selected program:—

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Prelude to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
Violin solo, Tulius Theodorowicz
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saens
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
JUN 6 1931

FIVE 'POP' CONCERTS ON SATURDAY NIGHTS FORM BOSTON BILL

The broadcasters have frequently offered concerts by the most famous orchestras in the country and have signed some of them for regular series over the networks.

They have even arranged for broadcasts to America by some of the best musical organizations in Europe. But somehow they have neglected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generally regarded as the most outstanding group in the country.

One program was given over the radio by the Boston orchestra last fall—a program especially designed for radio. It was one of the best of musical broadcasts but for some reason the orchestra did not come back to the air.

At last the radio's list of famous musical groups will be complete. Beginning tonight the Boston orchestra will give a series of five "pop" concerts. They will be heard every Saturday night for the next month.

The concerts will be designed to divert the perspiring parlors. There will be no tendency to heavy classics. Since the inauguration of the "pop" concert series by the Cleveland Orchestra a few weeks ago the broadcasters have arranged for more [illegible] this type.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" SERIES OPENS

WBZ Acts As Key Station For First — Arthur iFedler in Charge—On the Air at 8.30

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be offered radio audiences by the National Broadcasting company, will be heard over WBZ tonight from 8.30 to 9.30 p. m.

The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The series, given in Symphony hall, Boston, will be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The program, incorporating compositions by Bizet, Berlitz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli, will be heard by a vast radio audience over a nation-wide NBC network. Pickup and transmission of the music will be through station WBZ in Boston.

NBC, in presenting the inaugural program of the series, also brings to the radio audience the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, first Boston-born "pop" leader, and son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel quartet. Arthur Fiedler, born in Boston in 1894, attended the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin, studied conducting, piano and violin, and in 1915 joined the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Notable figures in the world of music have conducted the "pop" concerts, including Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski, Andre Maquarre and Gustave Strube. Later a more definite stress was laid on the musical side. Alfredo Casella, distinguished Italian composer-conductor-pianist, and, today, Arthur Fiedler, have brought fine compositions from the facile pens of brilliant masters to the "pop" audiences." This same practice will continue to hold true during the NBC presentations from Symphony hall during the NBC presentations from Symphony hall during the summer series this year.

The radio audience tonight will hear the following carefully selected program:—

Prelude to "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture to "The Roman Carnival"	Berlioz
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Prelude to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
Violin solo, Tulius Theodorowicz
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saens
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda."	Ponchiel

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
JUN 6 - 1931

On WJR

ARTHUR FIEDLER
This orchestra director will conduct the concert by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over WJR at 7:30 p. m. today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON "POP" CONCERTS ON WLW PROGRAM

Weekly Symphony Series To Start Over Blue Network Tonight.

ARTHUR FIELDER TO LEAD

Duchess of Atholl to Speak On Five-Year Plan From London Sunday.

By RADIO FORECASTER.

Beginning tonight, radio fans in this territory will be privileged to listen in to the Boston Symphony series of "pop" concerts. WLW will bring these concerts every Saturday night direct from Symphony Hall. This is the 46th series of "pop" concerts. Arthur Fiedler will conduct.

Duchess of Atholl.

The "pop" concerts date back to the time when formal rows of chairs were removed from Symphony Hall during the warm season and tables were installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer, munch sandwiches and smoke during Strauss waltzes or Sousa marches.

Tonight's program: Prelude to "Carmen" by Bizet; overture to "The Roman Carnival," by Berlioz; Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn; prelude to "The Deluge," by Saint-Saens; violin solo by Tulius Theodorowicz; "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saens, and "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," by Ponchielli.

[illegible] from

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

BOSTON OFFERS ITS SYMPHONY

Popular Concert to Be Played Tonight—Notes of Other Features.

Interesting to the habitual Saturday listener is the announcement of the first of a series of "pop" concerts by 93 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Trained to be one of the best musical organizations of its kind, this group comes to radio under the baton of Arthur Fielder. Just a bit of biography about Mr. Fielder reveals his birthdate to be 1894. He attended the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin where he studied conducting, piano and violin. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

Tonight's program, beginning at 7:30 o'clock, will not only inaugurate the "Pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The series will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and will be broadcast in Detroit by Station WJR.

* * *

[illegible] and clusters. His research [illegible] used by Dr. Harlow Shapley in d[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL
JUN 6 1931

By DOROTHY DORAN
Beacon Journal Radio Editor

BOSTON'S time-honored music institution known as "Pop" concerts, inaugurates a series on the air tonight when the 93 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra offer a program over NBC-WJZ network between 7:30 and 8:30 o'clock. This program is hailed by music lovers as an extravagant radio event.

Tonight's concert not only opens the series, but also marks the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Arthur Fielder, who comes from an old Boston family with considerable musical backgrcund, conducts the orchestra.

It is interesting to note that these concerts originated as Promenade concerts, later coming to be known as "Pop" concerts. This type of music presentation has been popular in Boston for almost 50 years.

This inaugural concert will bring music of Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Ponchielli. The latter will be represented in the Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda." Dial WLW for the relay.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANNAPOLIS, MD.
CAPITAL
JUN 6 1931

The first of a series of "pop" concerts by ninety-three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, masters of their respective instruments, will be heard over an NBC-WJZ network, tonight, from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., Annapolis time. The concert will not only inaugurate the "pop" series, but will mark the annual "Tech Night," a feature of graduation week at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It will incorporate composition by Bizet, Berloiz, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saens and Pinchielli.

Inauguration of the Boston "pop" concert series by NBC follows closely upon the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Historical scanning revels a pleasantly quaint tradition that harks back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was but four years old. A supplementary series of concerts of popular character was started to suit the warm season. The formal rows of seats were removed and tables installed so that concert patrons might sip their wine and beer. Originally known as the Promenade Concerts, the series speedily became known by the vernacular "pop."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
JUN 6 1931

GibbonesqueTalk On Dirigibles Scheduled

By BURGESS E. SMITH

Perhaps as a sop to few good symphonic programs during the summer, which this department has been bewailing, with others, the program makers have corralled the Boston Symphony for a season of "pop" concerts, the first at 7:30 tonight on the WHAM-NBC network. And lest you lovers of popular music view with alarm, you are promised music suitable for every taste; but we suspect, and hope, no such tunes as "Star Dust" or "Moonlight Saving Time" will be included, although we wouldn't object to "When Yuba Plays the Rhumba On the Tuba."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
JUN 6 - 1931

Boston Symphony on WLS.

The first of a series of five one-hour pop concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler, will be broadcast by WLS and the NBC tonight at 7:30 direct from Symphony hall in Boston. The first program this evening marks Tech night, annual graduation feature at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The ninety-three picked musicians tonight do numbers of Bizet, Mendelssohn and Saint Saens.

ARTHUR FIEDLER.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS
JUN 6 1931

Boston -- Willie Stribling -- Brevities -- V. R. Jacobs--Baseball--Cleveland-- Other Bits

By RAY D. O'TIP

NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO. offers you musical relief from the blare of Saturday dance, relaying the first of a series of "pop" concerts by the 93-piece Boston symphony.

* * *

"POP in Boston, however, doesn't mean "Wabash Moon" or "Peanut Vendor." Rather it refers to the prelude to "Carmen," overture to "Roman Carnival" and Dance of the Hours from "La Giaconda."

* * *

THE "Pop" concerts, incidentally, are an annual affair dating back to 1885 when one of the earlier Boston Symphonies played warm weather music in a quasi-beer garden where sandwiches were munched, cigars smoked and light liquors consumed in moderate quantities. Originally they were known as the Promenade Concerts but this speedily became shortened to the colloquial "Pop." If your're interested, and I think you should be, tune WLW at 7:30.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DECATUR, ILL.
REVIEW

Boston Symphony Series On Chain

"The Devil" on Saturday Night's Drama Bill.

A series of five one-hour "Pop" concerts by the Boston [illegible] orchestra, conducted by [illegible] Feidler, will begin Saturday [illegible] 6:30 p. m. through WLS, WJZ, WSM. Ninety-three members of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra will form this special musical group whose nightly "Pop" concerts have become an institution of the New England summer season with a nationwide reputation equal to that of the New York Stadium concerts, the St. Louis open [illegible] opera programs and the Hollywood concerts.

[illegible] act drama, "The Pot[illegible] "Fortune Smi[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK NEWS
JUN 7 - 1931

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra was featured in a Pop concert. This sample of what we are to expect during this new series offers much to look forward to, and time will fly as it did when they played the "Dance of the Hours" (WJZ, 8:30 P. M.).

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
JUN 13 1931

Sir Hamilton Harty to Lead Boston Pops.

Sir Hamilton Harty, the distinguished English conductor, is to visit Boston and take over a Pop concert, according to a cable received at Symphony Hall from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in England.

Arthur Fiedler, the conductor of the Pops, who has introduced Sir Hamilton Harty's orchestral arrangements at these concerts, will hand the baton to the distinguished English visitor for the Sunday Pop concert of June 21. This concert will be Sir Hamilton Harty's first appearance as conductor in America and his only engagement in the Eastern United States. He is on his way to California, where he is to conduct a series of concerts at the Hollywood Bowl in July.

Sir Hamilton Harty has been the famous conductor since 1920 of the Halle Orchestra of Manchester, Eng., with which he gives an annual series in London. Born in Hillsborough, Ireland, in 1879, he became church organist in County Antrim at the age of 12. He has had a long and distinguished career as accompanist, as composer, and as arranger of Irish folk songs and other music. He won his first high fame as conductor during the seasons in which he led the London Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

JUN 20 1931

On The Air

Sir Hamilton Harty, distinguished British conductor, will make his initial appearance in the United States during the Boston Symphony "pop" concert over WJZ at 7.30 o'clock this evening. He will attend the concert at the invitation of Arthur Fiedler, conductor, to hear his composition, "A Londonderry Air," played under Fiedler's direction. The program will feature the following:

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy" ..... Berloiz
Overture to "Oberon" ..Von Weber
Minuet ..... Bolzoni
Londonderry Air ....arr. by Harty
Tales From Johann Strauss ..... Korngold
Overture Solenelle (1812) ..... Tschaikowsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 14 1931

SIR HAMILTON HARTY TO CONDUCT AT BOSTON

Will Make First American Appearance at Symphony "Pop" Next Sunday

Sir Hamilton Harty, the distinguished English conductor, is to visit Boston to conduct a "pop" concert, according to a cable received at Symphony hall from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in England.

Arthur Fiedler, the conductor of the "pops" who has introduced Sir Hamilton Harty's orchestral arrangements at these concerts, will hand the baton to the English visitor for the concert of Sunday the 21st. This will be Harty's first appearance as a conductor in America and his only engagement in the Eastern United States. He is on his way to California where he is to conduct a series of concerts at the Holly bowl in July.

Sir Hamilton Harty has been the conductor since 1920 of the Halle orchestra of Manchester, Eng., with which he gives an annual series at London. Born in Hillsborough, Ire., in 1879, he became church organist in County Antrim at the age of 12. He has had a long and distinguished career as accompanist, as composer, and as arranger of Irish folk songs and other music. He won his first fame as conductor during the seasons in which he led the London Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

TUFTS CONFERS 349 DEGREES

Medford, Mass., June 15—(AP)—Tufts College today awarded eight honorary and 341 in course degrees at the 75th Commencement. The honorary degrees were conferred on Miss Marion Parkes, president of Bryn Mawr; Governor Stanley C. Wilson of Vermont; Miss Margaret A. Barnes, authoress; Rev. Harry L. Canfield of Greensboro, N. C.; Henry T. Claus, editor of the Boston Transcript; Dr. Alfred Worcester, professor of hygiene at Harvard; Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, and J. Stevens Kodesch, superintendent of Medford schools.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS

5

JUN 20 1931

Tonight

IF you care to know what's on the air, it's this.

Boston Symphony, WLW at 7:30 p. m., hears Sir Hamilton Harty, English composer, with a special arrangement of his famous tune "Londonberry Air." Sir Hamilton will be in Boston to hear the interpretation.

234

JUNE 2, 1931

Films

From Bologna and Also from Vienna

First-Hand Fascist Story of The Affront to Toscanini, His Troublesome Arm

THE thoroughgoing New York Times has laid hold of a Bolognese newspaper of May 15 last, containing a first-hand account of the affront to Mr. Toscanini by the Fascists of that town. With them the reporter is obviously in sympathy. His "story" runs: "During the afternoon . . . a rumor circulated about town that Mr. Toscanini had declared that he would refuse to conduct the Royal March and 'Giovinezza' [the Fascist hymn] at the opening of the concert upon the entry into the theater of his Excellency Ciano, decorated with a gold medal and representing the Government, together with his Excellency Arpinati, Under-Secretary of the Interior.

"The rumor was true. The matter was, in fact, being discussed between the city authorities and Mr. Toscanini. His Excellency Arpinati, in person, taking into consideration the objections of an artistic nature that Mr. Toscanini advanced, proposed that the maestro omit the hymn 'Giovinezza' and permit the concert-master to conduct only the Royal March upon the arrival of the Government delegate in the theater.

"To this proposal Mr. Toscanini sent a reply, insisting on his refusal and protesting that the playing of the national anthem would disturb the atmosphere of religious meditation that he considered indispensable to the art-commemoration which was to follow. [The purpose of the concert was to recall and honor the memory of Martucci, the Italian composer, sometime director of the noted Conservatory at Bologna.]

"The news of the absurd obstinacy of the maestro spread rapidly in Fascist circles, arousing heated agitation, all the more in that the analogous action of Mr. Toscanini in other cities, such as Turin, Milan and Rome under similar circumstances, had not been forgotten. [This refers to stormy incidents such as occurred in Milan in the early days of the revolution when the Fascisti threatened to pour castor oil down Toscanni's throat for declining to play 'Giovinezza.']

"The affair provoked the incident at the theater-entrance, where a number of Fascisti awaited the maestro's arrival, and, stopping him, asked him no less than twice, whether or not he would conduct the Royal March. Twice the maestro answered energetically with a decided 'No!' Following this refusal he was slapped. He then returned immediately to his car and drove back to the hotel.

"In a short time a crowd of several hundred Fascisti and citizens, apprised of what had happened, gathered under the windows of the Hotel Brun, where the maestro was staying, and protested vigorously, to the strains of the hymn, 'Giovinezza.' The Federal Fascist Secretary, Commander Mario Ghinelli, leader of the demonstration, went, in company with a number of Fascisti, to the members of Toscanini's family, some of whom were present in Bologna, to express officially the indignation of the local Fascismo, which, having given proof of high appreciation for the artistic genius of the great conductor, is not disposed to accept from any one affronts of whatsoever nature, still less affronts to its particular patriotic sensibility. Following the agreement reached between the maestro's family and the Federal Secretary, it was understood that Toscanini would quit the city as quickly as possible.

"On leaving the hotel Commander Ghinelli placed himself at the head of a procession, in which several hundred citizens joined, and still singing 'Giovinezza,' paraded through the streets, while the crowd applauded and made the Roman salute. Arriving before the Café San Pietro, the procession halted, while the café-orchestra played the national hymns, amid unanimous pplause."

Pendants

The correspondent in Milan of the London Morning Post has made this amusing discovery: "Toscanini was among the first supporters of Mussolini and stood with him as a political candidate in the General Elections that took place in Italy in 1919. Both Mussolini and Toscanini were defeated. Since that time Toscanini has not taken any active part in Italian politics."

The correspondent in Milan of the London Daily Telegraph described Mr. Toscanini's house under guard: "When I called at No. 20, Via Durina, this evening, I found the pavements of this quiet residential street bristling with carabineers and secret-service men; while the courtyard and entrance to the house itself contained, at a modest estimate, a further score. They stood, lolled, and sat in groups of three and four in every likely and unlikely corner, carefully criticising every caller."

A Disabled Arm?

The Neue Freie Presse, the well-informed Viennese newspaper, also adds a new particular that has less to do with the disturbances of the peace at Bologna and Milan than with the condition of Mr. Toscanini's conducting arm. It will be recalled that he was under contract as guest-conductor for concerts of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna on Saturday and Sunday last. The presumption was that he asked release because the Fascist withdrawal of his passport held him in Italy. It now appears that he is suffering from a neuritis in his right arm that has hampered him for some time past, even before he left New York. Of late it has become more acute. Had he been free to cross the Italian frontier, he could not have undertaken the promised concerts in Vienna.

A letter from Miss Anita Colombo, the directress of La Scala at Milan, to the Viennese orchestra is the authority quoted by the Freie Presse. As translated for the New York Times, it says:

> The great pains suffered by Maestro Toscanini during the last few months in the upper part of his right arm have forced him to limit his activities. He is now resting in Bologna. Assailed by the most actue pains, he has been forced to watch an assistant lead the rehearsals. Physicians here have earnestly advised a long rest because the condition of his arm has been unsatisfactory since last winter and he has not been able to move it about freely.
>
> Maestro Toscanini, who had made every preparation for his Viannese engagement, realizes clearly the serious and unexpected complications his decision entails. He has indeed hoped to overcome this condition soon, but unfortunately another turn for the worse has occurred and now necessitates a long rest.

N SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY

the World—Theatre

Conductors and Audiences

By WINTHROP P. TRYON

NEW YORK

CONDUCTORS, no matter who approves or disapproves, retain their own habits and cling to their own practices. They may, for a moment, change their methods and their policies in response to somebody's protest here, or to somebody's recommendation there; but, in the main, they refuse to surrender their preferences or to do what means a sacrifice of their individuality Now and then an artist of remarkably obliging disposition will give in a little and will alter his way of doing things enough to check controversy among his listeners and to keep peace in the musical community, as when Arturo Toscanini, some of the Philharmonic-Symphony subscribers criticizing him for his neglect of American music, allowed a New York composer to be represented on one of his programs. But, as a rule, they proceed with the kind of works they know most about and with the style of interpretation they like best; as much as to declare, or confess, that if we want something different, we must look elsewhere.

The question, viewed fairly, turns less on the person who makes music than on the people for whom he makes it; for a musician is really a product not so much of his own studying and cogitating as he is of the attention and the applause of his audience. When, therefore, we point out a man as one whose directing of an orchestra or a chorus we fancy, we are but announcing about ourselves that we are such and such a type of listener. In speaking of him favorably, we take credit, whether larger or smaller the measure, for his career, and we lay claim to a share in the renown of his achievements.

For safety's sake, I am inclined to concede the greatest possible merit to all conductors of serious intent; aware that as sure as I begin to remark upon failings, I am simply inviting dispute with some of my friends in concert attendance, near by or distant. So the most I will do in the way of partisanship is to submit that some conductors are suited to this sort of listening and others to that. Furthermore, I will give just a hint, in the interest of clear understanding, as to what my own special musical likings are.

Inasmuch, now, as I believe it is better to render allegiance to the flag that waves over the camp year in and year out, than to the sword that hangs at the side of a particular commander today and tomorrow only, I will note that I wish to be counted an adherent and supporter of the cause of choral and dramatic singing and of orchestral playing; and that while I stand ready to champion every conductor, man or woman, of motet, part-song, oratorio, opera or symphony, be his post distinguished or obscure, I am scarcely disposed to hold anybody up as the greatest of all time or even of the present time.

There stands Toscanini over the executants of the Philharmonic-Symphony. He may offer the music of what composers he chooses; surely I'll not ask him to bother himself with the tone poems of friends of mine who have taken a course in orchestration at the summer school of Fontainebleau, if he had rather store his memory with those of his own friends who have worked out the modern problem in the conservatories of Italy. There takes the platform Koussevitzky; and he constrains the Boston Symphony artists to study as many new scores in a season, I doubt not, as any predecessor of his did in the whole period of his incumbency. If they are willing, so am I, to try to puzzle the intricacies out. Steps to the front Stokowski. What an excitement, when his violins converse and his trombones harangue in the counterpoint of Bach! Then, at the high desk in the orchestra pit of the opera house, Bodanzky. It may be something a little short of the Wagner of Bayreuth that he sets forth; nevertheless it is indisptuably "Tristan," "Meistersinger" and "Götterdämmerung" that he gives us to enjoy.

Now Roussel Records Our Musical Lot

Boston, Chicago and Other Halts in His Visit Last Autumn

TRAVEL books have multiplied so fast in recent years that it is quite difficult for the traveler to view with a clear eye and a perfectly free mind a country which he is visiting for the first time. The United States, in particular, have been the subject of such numerous studies and American life has been so passionately discussed, praised, or denounced according to the notions, the character, or the temperament of each author concerned, that it seems to the transatlantic voyager as though debarkation on the banks of the Hudson could bring him no fresh revelation. Yet the arrival at New York remains profoundly impressive when, as the boat enters the lower harbor on a fine day, the city emerges little by little, as if by magic, from the light haze which envelops it and the newcomer sees the great skyscrapers one after another loom through the mist without being able quite to tell whether they are descending from the clouds or rising out of the earth. One hardly finds time to cast a random glance at that Statue of Liberty which might well have engraved on its pedestal the words, "To the Unknown Goddess." The magic spectacle is like an army of towers of Babel drawn up on parade as the boat passes. These pinnacles seem fixed for eternity in all their proud and formidable immobility. The Americans have now found a straightforward and purely geometric style which is in keeping with these gigantic structures. Their latest born, the Chrysler and the Empire State, seem to us like the new cathedrals of an epoch which has just changed its gods.

It is interesting to learn that in this country dominanted by a fever for business, the craze for gold, love of power, and a hankering to take a chance, the most immaterial of the arts, music, is most effectively supported, most sumptuously entertained. We know that the great American orchestras receive, not from the State but from private individuals, subsidies (or, more exactly, guaranties) which assure their functioning under the most favorable conditions. These conditions are favorable not merely on the side of personnel because of the advantageous contracts which it is possible to offer to musicians but also as regards the standard of performance because of the number of rehearsals which are stipulated. The members of the guaranty committees are by no means all lovers of music, but they feel that it is an honor for their city to possess a fine orchestra, and they believe it their social duty to contribute to the artistic development of their fellow citizens. It is scarcely necessary to add that these trustees make no pretense to influence the conductors of their orchestras in the choice of works to be performed. In America no musical clique presides over the work of program making. It would be highly desirable if in other countries where music is equally honored and where the existence of symphonic associations becomes a problem difficult of solution, this conception of social duty could become more general. Among us in France, as Philipe Gaubert has quite truly said, the true benefactors are the musicians of the orchestra.

It is only natural that organizations endowed with such means for development should reach full bloom, and it is unnecessary to decide here the relative skill of the selected players who make up the orchestras of Boston, Philadelphia, New York and Chicago—to mention only those which I had the opportunity to hear.

It is especially comforting for us to know in what high esteem the American conductors hold our French musicians. At Boston in particular, the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky includes Frenchmen to the number of one-third of its total membership. I believe, moreover, that I do not deceive myself when I say that Boston is the American city where French music is most often played and most highly appreciated. Thus, Serge Koussevitzky listed on his program of October 24 and 25 last several dance airs by Rameau (Minuet from "Platée," Musette and Tambourin from "Fêtes d'Hébé"), Symphony performed for the first time, of which I need not speak here, but which gained from a commanding performance, Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "Valse." It is useless to add that the standard of interpretation throughout this program was worthy of a conductor whom the Parisians have many times found occasion to applaud.

One point is interesting to note. In the week preceding a concert, the critics have the opportunity—and make use of it—of reading the scores of works which will be played (I speak now of the custom in Boston) and as the works themselves are played twice, at the Friday matinée and on Saturday evening, and as the serious critics generally attend both performances, it may readily be seen what assurance is given the composer that his work will not be prematurely judged. It is further interesting to note that these great orchestras are not content each with enriching the musical life of its own city. They leave their home port from time to time to journey through the neighboring cities or university towns where their performances are always crowded. Boston goes to visit New York, Providence, Cambridge or Wellesley. Stokowski's orchestra travels from Philadelphia to New York, Baltimore, or Washington. Such tours as these create a spirit of emulation by which music cannot but profit. Certain cities even have regular concerts for children—an excellent idea which is beginning to be put into practice in Paris and which might well become a custom everywhere.

Continued on Following Page

As Roussel Sees Us

Continued from Preceding Page

One of the most striking and curious figures among American benefactors of music is without question Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. An incessant traveler, passing her life in the palaces of the old or the new world, founder of a prize for chamber music, never hesitating for a concert given in Paris to import some virtuoso from New York and perhaps another from London, appearing now at Prague, tomorrow at Venice, next month in Chicago, always followed by her interpreters, Mrs. Coolidge has inspired the composition of a number of works of chamber music which, without her, would never have seen the light. To her love of music the world owes a flood of sonatas, trios, quartets, compositions for voice, for wind instruments, and what not besides. The festival of five concerts which she gave last October in Chicago, where she received composers and musicians in regal style, included, along with several classical works by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Monteverdi, a dozen or fifteen modern works, of which five were performed for the first time. These five were by Hindemith, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Gustav Strube, Loeffler and Conrad Beck. By the last named there was a curious and extremely well-balanced concerto for string quartet and orchestra.

It was an exacting test, this festival, demanding as it did five days' constant attendance in the concert hall from a public which might well have declared itself fed up long before the end of so bountiful a bill of fare. But the public was faithful. At every performance it filled the concert-room of the Field Museum in which the festival took place—a room by the way admirably proportioned for the peculiar requirements of chamber music. Of course the performers were exceptional, among them being our compatriot, the marvelous flutist Georges Barrere.

Such ample generosity as Mrs. Coolidge's, typical as it is of the Americans in their dealings with music, is to be seen also in the management of their conservatories, schools, institutes and the like. There are plenty of these in America, a prodigal number indeed, such as we are unused to in Europe. They are run with a lavishness, a prodigality of expenditure to which we are not accustomed in Europe. Take a single example: at the Rochester Conservatory where for several years our excellent organist, Abel Decaux, who is rightly popular, has taught, the students of the organ have at their command for practise hours no less than twelve rooms, each provided with a very good instrument. Are there many schools like this among us? Someone may answer me by pointing out that America has at her command resources greater than we possess and that we should be equally ostentatious if we had the means. But I am not at all sure about that! If we were richer we should retain a few more functionaries, and that would do. For the great prerequisite is that there should be at the heart of a nation a faith in art, without which money is powerless and a conviction that music is a part of the common wealth, the existence of which must be protected and the development of which must be carefully nourished.

Such a faith can never come to pass unless we interest ourselves, from their childhood, in all those who seem fitted to receive a musical education. This question of music in the schools is unfortunately not a subject of debate among parliamentarians. In spite of the good will of a few, in spite of the repeated efforts of musicians like Gabriel Pierné and Roger Ducasse, it does not seem that our political leaders are aware of the importance of the problem. It should, however, be easy to open their eyes by pointing out what is going on just beyond our frontiers. In Berlin the State Theater is spending tens of thousands of marks in the presentation of a French opera—Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb." This work in a new technique, difficult of performance, and on that account a subject for debate, the German State Theater is sustaining by playing and replaying it so as to make it better understood and give it a permanent place. In the United States, where the Government does not intervene, it is the private citizens who have taken into their own hands the welfare of music and will not let it flag. In 1929 the advisory board of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was able to announce in the concert program books that the number of subscribers to the much increased expenses of the orchestra had jumped in ten years from one hundred and twenty-seven to three hundred and ninety-seven persons. This is a typical instance.

In France it would be rather difficult to prove that the State is doing its duty toward music, and it would be extremely hazardous to affirm that private initiative is making up for governmental indifference. We are bankrupt on both counts in spite of a few good wishes and a few efforts which, for lack of co-operation, remain fruitless The fact is that we must go back and begin things at the beginning. We must form the taste and open the ears of children as is done elsewhere. We have admirable orchestras. Doubtless it is the educators who are lacking. Why are not our symphonic societies engaged to perform once or twice a year in our large provincial cities which have no orchestras? I know the complaint: Radio, phonograph, costly and tiresome road trips. But there are phonographs and radio concerts in New York also, and the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or the Philadelphia Orchestra fills Carnegie Hall to overflowing. Beyond question, they draw a distinction over there between listening to music direct and hearing it through a mechanical intermediary.

It is enough to recall the number of listeners who each week attend the concerts given by our six or seven Parisian orchestras to reassure ourselves that we love music in France. But we love it indifferently well and are something less than grateful for its benefits. We accept what is given but without saying thank you. But we should learn how to say it, and how to say it more adequately than we do now when we reward with a few nice words or a patter of applause all those musicians of the orchestra who by their sure skill and technical power offer to their fellow citizens in the purest and most inspiring surroundings, momentary forgetfulness of their cares and the monotony of life. ALBERT ROUSSEL

[Translated from Le Courier Musical by D.W.B.]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JUN 21 1931

Symphony Prints Anniversary Book

To commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Houghton-Mifflin has brought out a new edition of M. A. DeWolf Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," with the new dates 1881-1931.

The volume has been revised and extended and contains account of the war years and the latest triumphs under Serge Koussevitzky. The able press representative at Symphony Hall, John Burk, has collaborated on the last chapters and many of the incidents make fascinating reading.

235

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

JUN 19 1931

U. S. Composers' Symphony Rank Listed in Survey

23 Works by 15 Writers Hold Places on Repertoires, Prof. Mason Concludes

Mid-West Plays Them Most

N. Y. Ensemble Found Least Attentive to Americans

Twenty-three works by fifteen American composers have been able to hold a place over a period of years in the repertoire of the chief symphony orchestras of this country, Daniel Gregory Mason, professor of music at Columbia University, has found after a survey of the programs of ten prominent orchestras from 1925 through the end of the musical season of 1929-'30. He also found that, except for the Boston Symphony, the large metropolitan orchestras of the Eastern seaboard fall behind the "more healthily local-spirited, provincial orchestras, especially those of the Middle West" in giving representation to American composers.

Professor Mason, writing in the issue of "Musical America," published yesterday, cites a list compiled six years ago by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, giving the American works most often performed by thirteen of the most prominent American orchestras between 1919 and 1925, and adds the American compositions which have been played by two or more of the ten orchestras represented in his survey between 1925 and 1930.

List According to Composers

The combined list, with figures in parentheses giving the number of orchestras which have played the work in the latter five-year period, is:

Carpenter, John Alden: Adventures in a Perambulator (2); Concertino for piano and orchestra (2), Skyscrapers (7).
Chadwick, George Whitefield: Anniversary Overture: Tam O'Shanter (3).
Eichheim, Henry: Oriental Impressions (5).
Gershwin, George: An American in Paris (4).
Goldmark, Rubin: Negro Rhapsody (3).
Griffes, Charles Tomlinson: The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan; The White Peacock (2).
Gruenberg, Louis: Jazz Suite (4).
Hadley, Henry: The Ocean.
Hanson, Howard: Lux Aeterna; Nordic Symphony (3); Pan and the Priest (4).
Hill, Edward Burlingame: Stevensoniana.
MacDowell, Edward Alexander: Woodland Suite; Piano Concerto No. 2 (2); Indian Suite.
Mason, Daniel Gregory: Symphony No. 1 (3), Russians, for barytone and orchestra; Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra; Chanticleer (3).
Powell, John: Rhapsodie Negre; In Old Virginia (2).
Schelling, Ernest: A Victory Ball (4); Impressions from an Artist's Life (2); Fantastic Suite.
Skilton, Charles Sanford: Indian Dances.
Sowerby, Leo: King Estmere (2); Comes Autumn Time; From the Northland (2); Piano Concerto; Money Musk (2).
Taylor, Deems: Through the Looking Glass (3); Jurgen (2).
Whithorne, Emerson: New York Days and Nights (2).

Chicago Ensemble Praised

Listing the American works played between 1925 and 1930 by the Chicago Symphony; Boston Symphony, Philadelphia Orchestra, and New York Philharmonic Orchestra (Philharmonic-Symphony after 1928), Professor Mason credits the Chicago orchestra, under Frederick Stock, with the best American repertoire, displaying "hospitality of mind and many-sidedness of interest," giving due representation to older and better-established American composers, to younger men and to local talent. The Chicago Symphony played forty-two American works during the period under consideration.

The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky in most of its concerts, played thirty-three American works, with an "impressive" roster of established composers and a "fair proportion" of local names. But Professor Mason considers that the inclusion of three "cosmopolitan" Jewish composers and two expatriate Americans "seems to give a more European, exotic flavor" and make the Boston list "a little less representatively American."

The Philadelphia Orchestra played seventeen American works representing, according to Professor Mason, only six "standard American composers," among fourteen, while the list, in the writer's opinion, reflects a "love of the bizarre, of the strikingly unusual" which Professor Mason considers a feature of Leopold Stokowski's program-making. Two of the works by "standard" composers, Arthur Farwell and Henry Gilbert, it is noted, were offered by Pierre Monteux.

New York Group Last of Four

The New York Philharmonic comes last among the four orchestras in American representation with only ten works, and Professor Mason finds here "but the slightest interest in the growth of our native music." Inclusion of the season of 1930-'31, however, would have increased the figure to fourteen.

These figures depend, to some extent, on the basis used for considering a composer American. Professor Mason does not limit his list to native-born composers, but omits one or two prominent naturalized American composers, such as Charles Martin Loeffler, considering, presumably, that, despite Mr. Loeffler's long residence in this country, that his training and the influences shaping his music have been primarily European.

BLANK PAGE

NEW YORK TIMES, February 7, 1931

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD AT ITS BEST

Brilliant Concert Brings Forth Sibelius's Unfamiliar Seventh Symphony.

BACH PRELUDES AS OPENING

Strauss's "Domestica" Completes List of Koussevitzky's Offerings to Enthusiastic Audience.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The unsurpassed and seldom equaled Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave an extremely brilliant concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Not often has the writer heard as fine a performance from this orchestra, at any time in its career. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a superb ensemble of virtuosi. For its string section alone it would be pre-eminent, but its brass and wind choirs are now of almost equal quality and balance. Not only this: Mr. Koussevitzky has sensitized the orchestra until it is a model of flexibility and fineness of texture.

Last night this magnificent instrument glowed with beauty and color; the sheer tonal qualities of the playing would have bestowed significance upon the music. The audience, deeply impressed by the performance, applauded and cheered.

No new works were introduced at this concert, but the program had matter of uncommon interest. It opened with two Bach preludes, as arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, followed by the unfamiliar and unique symphony of S i b e l i u s—his seventh—and finally with the Strauss "Sinfonia Domestica." One might have asked, after music of the rare distinctions of Sibelius, Why the performance of the Domestica? which is one of the more bourgeois and heavy-footed of Strauss's scores. The explanation was two-fold. Strauss's music is more effective in the sheerly exterior sense than that of Sibelius, and more familiar to the public, while Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Strauss minimized his vulgarities and long-windedness and glorified those pages—and there are many—in which the Straussian lyricism and the sheer richness of the Strauss style are most conspicuously present.

Bach Preludes Beautifully Played.

The Bach preludes, admirably contrasted, were prophetic of the quality of the evening. The first prelude was played with a simplicity, a lack of unnecessary dynamic contrast, a sustainment of melodic line and mood ideally appropriate to the music. The string choir, having distinguished itself here, then displayed a fire and virtuosity of which any solo violinist could have been proud. This music was to the advantage of the symphony which followed, since the Sibelius of the seventh symphony, in contrast to the youthful composer of earlier works, is a musician of pure line and of sheerly musical intent, and therefore not out of place after Bach.

The Seventh symphony is a very striking example of the evolution of Sibelius's art. The style of the early symphonies, which are beginning to grow popular, was romantic and, one would say, panoramic. Back of the passion and strength of the music was the landscape element—the sounds of the North, its sternness and desolation, its mists and lowering skies. There were also the long, simple melodies which formed the backbone of the symphonic structure.

Sibelius in a New Light.

Now, the symphony heard last night is all melody, but of how different a kind than the splendid outbursts of the first symphonies or the tone-poems "En saga"! All the paraphernalia of those previous scores, imposing and heroic as it was, has been discarded. So, likewise, has the heavy orchestration of the earlier works. From Sibelius's Fourth Symphony onward there is an amazing purification of style—no dramatic gestures, no heaven-defying tragedy or alarms of battle, but sheer beauty for beauty's sake—pure music, obeying its own laws, following inner principles of its own being, and the whole molded in masterly form and design.

Sibelius, in this late work, uses only the simplest phrases. He seems to search for the plainest motives, the most transparent harmonies, the clearest arrangement of ideas. His scoring is largely for the strings. And instead of a symphony built in great blocks of tone you have one which is almost a string quartet in the fineness of its facture and the interweaving of its parts.

The Seventh Symphony is in one movement, with prodigious adjustment of the details of the form. There is symphonic statement and recapitulation; there are elements of the different movements of the classic symphony, but there are a closeness of development and an inter-relation of the smallest fragments of the score which grow more impressive with every hearing.

This is Sibelius, the master, in the most intimate communion with nature, oblivious of the world, thinking out loud. It is scarcely courage for him to be so independent and careless, for these traits are merely his inborn characteristics! A composer has actually been found who wants to compose and, outside of that, does not care. And while vociferous young men of today have been talking about "abstract" form and music disassociated from poetry or other "romantic" elements, Sibelius has quietly and masterfully been writing it: music which instinctively expresses the modern spirit, but with what a noble simplicity, reticence and utter disregard of compromise!

Ovation for the Performers.

It was obvious that this symphony last night puzzled a part of the audience, while the other part applauded long and persistently, recalling Mr Koussevitzky until the orchestra rose to bow with him.

It should be said here that it is hard to think of the Sibelius Seventh Symphony performed with more technical precision and sensitiveness of nuance, and more fidelity to its deepest inner spirit, than were shown on this occasion. As for Sibelius himself, who is as far ahead of public taste in these late works as his earlier scores were ahead of the audiences of thirty years ago, he can afford to await the complete recognition which he is sure to receive.

The performance of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," as we have said, was little short of a glorification of that work. Presented in such a light, it was impossible to sustain long and logically held objections to it. The plentitude of melody and the endless richness of Strauss's counterpoint last night were simply irresistible, if only for the splendor and virtuosity of the orchestra's playing.

What is one to do with this Strauss? What right has a composer to go suburban, to foist on an audience the private life of his household from evening to dawn, inclusive, and succeed in making music.

It is all very well to say that the proceeding is in bad taste—which is true—and that it cannot be done. Unfortunately for the argument, it is done. It may not be done with the distinction that pertains to an "Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote," but in the same "Sinfonia domestica" there is page upon page of exulting, kindling music, and there is such bravura of counterpoint that when it is expounded as last night the listener was welling up in him a tendency to shout "Hurrah." The proof of the music was in the performance. No wonder that this was followed by a demonstration.

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
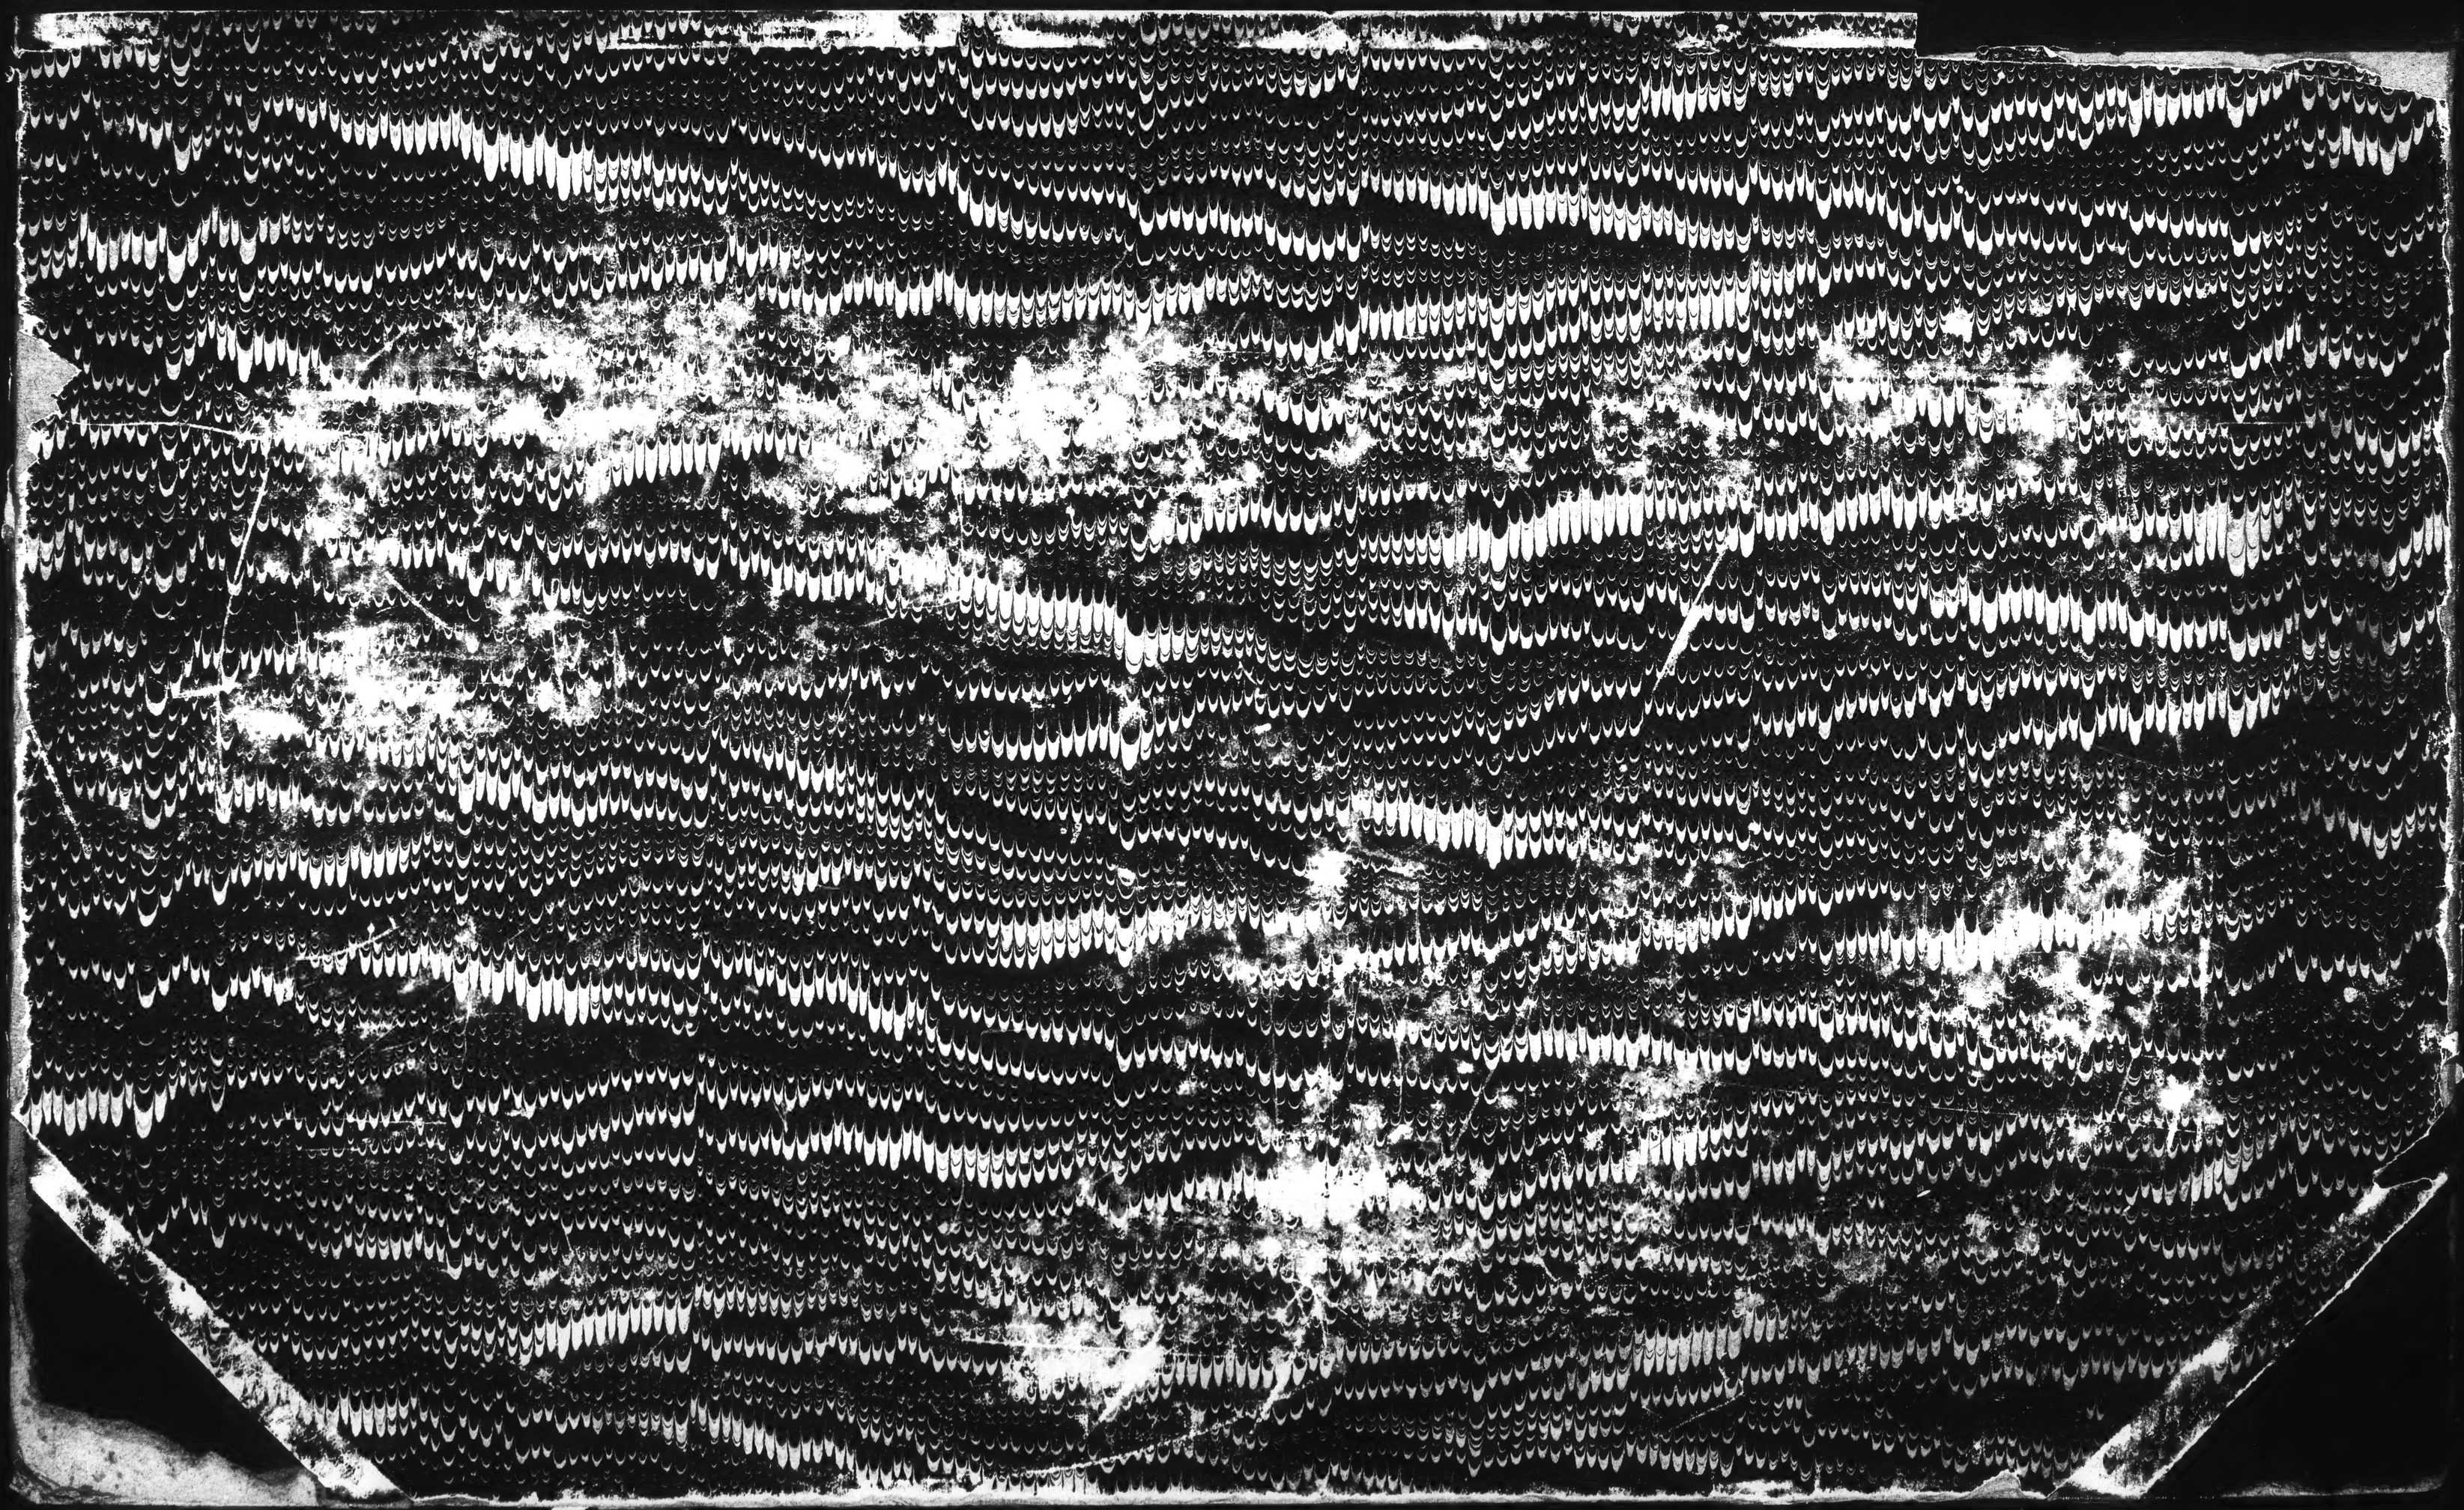
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND